R. R. TELEGRAPHER
Increases Ability on Right Food.

Anything that will help the R. R. Telegrapher to keep a clear head and steady nerves is of interest to operators particularly and to the public generally.

As the waste of brain and nerve cells in active work of this kind is great, it is important that the right kind of food be regularly used to repair the waste.

"I have used Grape-Nuts," writes a B. R. P. operator, "for the past six or eight years, daily, buying it by the dozen pkgs.

"A friend of mine, a doctor, who had been eating me for stomach trouble and nervous exhaustion, recommended me to leave off so much meat and use fruit and vegetables, with Grape-Nuts as the cereal part of each meal.

"I did so with fine results and have continued Grape-Nuts from that time to the present. I find in my work as R. R. Telegrapher that I can do more work and far easier than I ever could on the old diet.

"To any man who is working his brain and who needs a cool, level head and quick action, I recommend Grape-Nuts, from long experience." "There's a Reason."

"Of course not," cut in Ned. "McGinnis is no fool, and he knows his place."

"Most assuredly," declared Frank, with a sudden tightening of his lips. "You'll not see him again, I fancy. If he annoys you, let me know."

"Oh, but 'twon't be an annoyance," smiled Margaret. "I asked him to come and see me."

"You—asked—him—to come!" To the Spencers it was as if she had taken one of the big black wheels from the mills and suggested its desirability as an ornament for the drawing-room. "You asked him to come!"

Was there a slight lifting of the delicately moulded chin opposite?—the least possible dilation of the sensitive nostrils? Perhaps. Yet Margaret's voice, when she answered, was clear and sweet.

"Yes. I told him that Belcourt would always welcome my friends, I was sure. And—wasn't I right?"

"Of course—certainly," three almost inaudible voices had murmured. And that had been the end of it, except that the two brothers and the sister had talked it over in low distressed voices after the Margaret had gone up stairs to bed.

Two weeks had passed now, however, since that memorable night, and the veranda of Belcourt had not yet echoed to the sound of young McGinnis's feet. The Spencers breathed a little more freely in consequence. It might be possible, after all, thought they, that McGinnis had some sense—and the emphasis was eloquent.

CHAPTER XXIII

MISS KENDALL was sitting alone before the great fireplace in the hall at Belcourt when Betty, the parlor maid, found her. Betty's nose, always inclined to an upward tilt, was even more disdainful than usual this morning. In fact, Betty's whole self from cap to dainty shoes radiated strong disapproval.

"There's a young person—a very impertinent young person—at the side door, Miss, who insists upon seeing you," she said severely.

"Me? Seeing me? Who is it, Betty?"

"I don't know, Miss. She looks like a mill-girl." Even Betty's voice seemed to shrink from the "mill" as if it feared contamination.

"A mill-girl? Then it must be Mrs. Merideth or Mr. Spencer that she wants to see."

"She said you, Miss. She said she wanted to see—" Betty stopped, looking a little frightened.

"Yes, go on, Betty."

"That—that she wanted to see Miss Maggie Kendall," blurted out the horrified Betty. "Mag of the Alley."

Miss Kendall sprang to her feet.

"Bring the girl here, Betty," she directed quickly. "I will see her at once."

Just what and whom she expected to see, Margaret could not have told. For the first surprised instant it seemed that some dimly remembered Patty or Clarabella or Arabella from the past must be waiting out there at the door; the next moment she knew that this was impossible, for time, even in the Alley, could not have stood still, and Patty and the twins must be women grown now.

Out at the side door the "impertinent young person" received Betty's order to "come in" with an airy toss of her head, and a jeering "There, what'd I tell ye?" but once in the subdued luxury of soft rugs and silken hangings, and face to face with a beauteous vision in a trailing pale blue gown, she became only a very much frightened little girl about eleven years old.

"What is your name, little girl?" asked Miss Kendall, gently.

The child swallowed and choked. "Nellie Magoon, ma'am, if you please, thank you," she stammered.

"Where do you live?"

"Down on the Prospect Hill road."

"Who sent you to me?"

"Mis' Durgin."

Miss Kendall frowned and paused a moment. As yet there had not been a name that she recognized, nor could she find in the child's face the slightest resemblance to any one she had ever seen before.

"But I don't understand," she protested. "Who is this Mrs. Durgin? What did she tell you to say to me?"

"She said, 'Tell her Patty is in trouble an' wants ter see Mag of the Alley,'" murmured the child, as if reciting a lesson.

"Patty? Patty? Not Patty Murphy!" cried Miss Kendall, starting forward and grasping the child's arm.

Nellie drew back, half frightened.

"Yes, ma'am, no ma'am, I don't know, ma'am," she stammered.

"But how came she to send for me? Who told her I was here?"

"The boss."

"The—boss?"

"Yes. Mr. McGinnis, ye know. He said as how you was here."

"Bobby!" cried Miss Kendall, releasing the child's arm and falling back a step. "Why, of course it's Patty—it must be Patty! I'll go to her at once. Wait here while I dress."

And she hurried across the hall and up the broad stairway.

Back by the door Nellie watched the disappearing blue draperies with wistful eyes that bore also a trace of resentment. "Go and dress," indeed! As if there could be anything more altogether to be desired than that beautiful trailing blue gown! She was even more dissatisfied ten minutes later when Miss Kendall came back in the trim brown suit and walking hat—it would have been so much more delightful to usher into Mrs. Durgin's presence that sumptuous robe of blue! She forgot her disappointment, however, a little later, in the excitement of rolling along at Miss Kendall's side in the Belcourt carriage, with the imposing looking coachman in the Spencer livery towering above her on the seat in front.

It had been Miss Kendall's first thought to order the runabout, but a sudden remembrance of her morning's experience a few weeks before caused her to think that the stalwart John and the horses might be better; so John, somewhat to his consternation, it must be confessed, had been summoned to take his orders from Nellie as to roads and turns. He now sat, stern and dignified, in the driver's seat, showing by the very lines of his stiffly-held body his entire disapproval of the whole affair.

Nor were John and Betty the only ones at Belcourt who were conscious of keen disapproval that morning. The mistress herself from an upper window watched with dismayed eyes the departure of the carriage.

"I've found Patty, the little girl who was so good to me in New York," Margaret had explained breathlessly, flying into the room three minutes before. "She's in trouble and has sent for me. I'm taking John and the horses, so I'll be all right. Don't worry!" And with that she was gone, leaving behind her a woman too dazed to reply by so much as a word.

Belcourt was not out of sight before Margaret turned to the child at her side.

"You said she was in trouble—my friend Patty. What is it?" she questioned.

"It's little Maggie. She's sick."

Dickens' Complete Works

20 BEAUTIFUL VOLUMES -- ALMOST HALF PRICE

THE FAMOUS OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS EDITION

FROM critics everywhere this famous set of Dickens' Complete Works has called forth the unanimous opinion that it is by all odds the most desirable and companionable as well as one of the most beautiful editions ever published. Among the many special features endearing it to booklovers and collectors, as well as to the reading public, are the following:

FIRST. It is printed on the world-famed Oxford Bible paper, made by a secret process, and as a result every volume is a featherweight; there is absolutely no bulk or ungainliness in the size of even the thickest volume.

SECOND. Over 700 Superb Illustrations, reproduced after priceless originals by the master illustrators of Dickens' works make every volume a delight to the eye and lend an added interest to every story. The 20 Volumes aggregate 15,428 Pages.

THIRD. The type is exceptionally large and clear, making easy reading for even eyes dimmed with age, and every book opens flat like an Oxford Bible, without breaking at the back.

FOURTH. The books are just the right size, measuring $4\frac{1}{4} \times 6\frac{3}{4}$ inches—not too large for the pocket, yet not too small to adorn the most pretentious library shelves, side by side with books that have cost five times their price.

FIFTH. The binding is of a rich deep Blue Art Cloth, with Gilt Top and full Gold Back. Specially designed endpapers, reproducing a Bust of Dickens and a number of his best-loved characters in a fanciful treatment, add a soft finishing touch to each volume and the hall-mark of perfection to a set of books in every respect faultless.

The Author Whom the Whole World Loves

CHARLES DICKENS

BY far the most wonderful and brilliant literary genius of the nineteenth century was Charles Dickens—Dickens, whose irresistible stories and characters we loved in childhood days; whom we read with keener interest as experience ripens our appreciation, and to whom we turn with added relish at fourscore years and ten!

Familiarity with the works of Charles Dickens is practically a part of the education of English-speaking people the world over. The trouble has been to find an edition of his works that is not too heavy or bulky to be really readable—companionable; even the costly editions are a burden to handle; you rob yourself of the unspeakable delight of spending idle hours or long evenings with the author whom the whole world loves, because either you do not possess his works, or else have not the right set. Here is Your Opportunity to Buy to-day, at almost HALF PRICE, an edition of Dickens' Complete Works that is a marvel of typographical perfection, profusely and exquisitely illustrated, and at the same time portable and a pleasure to read.

From The Publisher's Weekly, New York

"The books are exquisitely printed in Long Primer type on the "miraculous Oxford Bible Paper, and altogether the set is perfection."

Additional Features

This Edition includes new portraits of Dickens and all the additional stories and sketches that appear in the Gadskill and Authentic Editions, making it the most complete ever published.

Each book contains a list of chief characters, printed for convenient reference. Every volume is separately wrapped and the entire set packed in a wooden box.

Questions and Answers

B. R. K., Ohio. How is a message sent by wireless telegraphy?

A transmitter is made to set up etheric vibrations, which are propagated through the atmosphere and affect the coherer, part of the receiving instrument. The discharges of the transmitter are controlled by a form of the ordinary telegraph key. The receiving instrument is a form of the ordinary Morse recorder and sounder to record the dots and dashes. Marconi uses in place of the coherer a simpler instrument, the "receptor." By his system it is not necessary to have the instruments "attuned." It is impossible to give a full account in a limited space. See Collins's Wireless Telegraphy, Its Theory, History and Practice.

J. B. G., Wilton, Me. Please explain John 20: 23: "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained."

The power conferred by Christ on his disciples is to be construed in a ministerial or declarative sense, as the authorized interpreters of his Word. In a personal and authoritative sense, this power was never exercised by any of the apostles, and clearly was not understood by them as possessed by them or conveyed to them personally, or except as his representatives, or the interpreters of his divine will and mercy.

J. B., Wellston, Okla. When does the date change on the international date line? Does it change at 12 o'clock in daytime or 12 o'clock at night?

East of the date line the day is dated one day earlier than west of it. Ships crossing the line at once change the date records on their logs without regard to the time of day. They take up or lose a day at the imaginary line, depending on their course, and the hour has nothing to do with it.

Old Subscriber, Bennettsville, S. C. Is it right for a Christian man or woman to attend a ball game, knowing that bets are being made on the game?

Your presence and example may help to discourage betting. There is no finer or manlier sport than baseball.

Reader, Harding, S. D. Are the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at liberty to read in public the sermon printed in its pages? Sometimes the minister is absent at this place, and then people request me to read them a sermon. I did so once, but I wondered if I did right.

Certainly, they have that privilege and it is one which is exercised in many of the remote rural districts throughout the Union to-day. We know of sections where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sermon forms the principal feature of the Sunday service, being read by some good Christian brother or sister in the family circle, or to groups of neighbors in some farm-house or meeting house, in the absence of a regular preacher. All are welcome to make this use of the sermon, and we trust it may be accompanied by blessing. It would, however, be unprofessional and wrong for a regular preacher to preach the sermon as his own. When it is read by a lay brother or sister, the sermon is being put to the very best purpose.

S. P., Lake City, Minn. If a foreigner becomes a citizen of the United States, does his citizenship lapse if he lives abroad for a long time, or does it stay good?

This question was submitted to Mr. G. H. Crawford, the well-known New York lawyer, who says in part:

"This question cannot be answered by a mere 'yes' or 'no,' as you will perceive by the following statement: The question whether a naturalized citizen of the United States has lost his rights as such citizen by reason of long residence abroad depends upon his intention. Such a citizen might go abroad and might be compelled by sickness of himself or family, or by imperative business engagements, to remain out of this country for a long time, and yet if his intention all the time was to return to the United States, he would not lose his citizenship by such foreign residence. If, on the other hand, after having become naturalized he should leave this country with no intention of returning, especially if he did not pay taxes here or retain any interest in business or property in this country; then, upon the question going before proper authority, the decision would probably be that he had lost his rights as an American citizen. There have been decisions to this effect. . . . It has been established by treaty with several nations—Bavaria, Denmark, Norway and Sweden, Prussia, and several German States—that if a naturalized citizen returns to his native country and continues to reside there for more than two years, the presumption is that he has abandoned his citizenship in this country.

E. S. B., Utica, N. Y. A minister says "we will be judged by our possibilities, and not by what we have done." How am I to take that statement, for I know I have not lived up to my possibilities?

It is a statement on which it is well not to dogmatize. Works alone will save no man, yet they will be considered in the Judgment. It is our duty to do at all times the best we can, and whether we fail or succeed is less important than that we should have sincerely tried. Probably no man ever lived up to his fullest possibilities, so the statement you quote would practically rule out the entire human race, if pushed to the extreme limit.

A reader in Cheney, Neb., whose young son is interested in our Children's Home, sends in this delightful letter from the little fellow, which will interest our juvenile readers and perhaps their elders as well:

Enclosed find $3 to give one child a ten days'

outing at Mont-Lawn. Hope it may be as pleasant an outing as I have just been enjoying. I am nine years old, and on the 9th of June grandma took me to the Sand Hills in Lincoln, Neb., to visit my two little cousins, Wendell and Perry Richmond. What a gloriously good time we had, riding old Tom over the hills and through the valleys. It is a beautiful country, and my three weeks' visit was soon a thing of the past, but I shall not soon forget it. THURSTON TEMPLE.

Having enjoyed a good time himself, this golden-hearted little fellow thought the best thing he could do was to "pass it along" to some poor tenement boy or girl. Hence his gift to the Home, where some city waif is now having an outing through his generosity.

Mrs. C. C. M., McRae, Fla. How old was Samuel when the Lord called him? (I. Sam. 3: 4.)

According to Josephus (Antiquities v, 10, 4) he was about twelve years old.

J. T. D., Appleton, Wis. What are the latest findings of reliable and competent scholars as to the quality of the wine that Jesus made at the wedding at Cana, whether it was fermented or not?

All opinions regarding the character of the wine miraculously produced at Cana are mere speculation; but we can be assured that whatever came from the hand of Deity was not only harmless, but wholesome, and therefore not of character to "steal away men's brains" or to produce intoxication.

Missionary B. C. Patterson, Suchien-ku, China, writes:

A paragraph has just appeared in a Shanghai Chinese, secular paper, written by some of the gentry of Suchien. It was headed: "Sincer Thanks for Famine Relief." Then followed grateful acknowledgment of the work of the missionaries at Suchien, "who distributed the aid sent from the West. But for it we could not have lived through the fourth moon of last year. On the anniversary of this fourth moon we wish to acknowledge afresh our indebtedness."

"Signed, Lu, Tu, etc."

It is pleasing to all who were personally interested in our Chinese relief work to learn of the deep gratitude of these people, upon whom the generosity of Christian America has made a lasting impression.

A. C. B., May's Landing, N. J. What is meant by "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence" (I. Timothy 2: 12)?

In this Epistle, Paul had in mind the condition of affairs in Corinth, whence he probably wrote. He was discussing the conduct of women in the public services and, adopting the opinions prevalent in his day, decided that it was unbecoming for a woman to teach publicly, or in any way to usurp authority over the others before the world. He may have had some particular case in mind in making this observation in the Epistle.

A. S. H. How did Fast Day and Thanksgiving Day originate in this country?

Fast in this country was of Puritan origin. It was first observed in Massachusetts and had legal observance there until within a few years. It is still observed in some States; usually the day is Good Friday. The first Thanksgiving Day in America was held in Plymouth Colony in 1621, in the autumn. Its observance for a while was confined to the New England Colonies and States, but for many years it has been observed as a national festival, the President appointing by proclamation the last Thursday in November.

R. V. G., Pensacola, Fla. How many governments are there and how are they governed?

A recent list gives twenty-three republics and fifty-six empires, kingdoms and principalities. This does not include some semi-independent tribes in Africa which are large enough to be considered nations in themselves.

An Ohio reader sends us the programme of a Sunday "picnic," which is a strange jumble of piety and Sabbath desecration. It opens with a mass at ten; dinner served at noon, religious and other addresses at 1:30; then games and contests, races by single and married women, prizes for the most popular lady, most beautiful woman, etc., etc. The district would be inviting territory for some energetic evangelist.

Miscellaneous

J. L., Rochester, N. Y. It was only profane swearing that was in question. On general grounds we approve the views of your letter.

F. M. B., Abingdon, Va. Nothing is revealed beyond what is expressed in Scripture. See I. Cor. 15th chapter, and I. Thess. 4th and 5th chapters.

Reader. We would suggest that you address the superintendent of the Training School for Nurses of the following hospitals: Bellevue, 428 East Twenty-sixth Street, New York; St. Luke's, Amsterdam Avenue and One Hundred and Thirtieth Street, New York; Presbyterian, Seventieth Street and Madison Avenue, New York, and Johns Hopkins, Baltimore, Md.

A. C., N. Y. A lie, or a deception tantamount to a lie, no matter how desirable or how excellent the purpose it serves, is never justifiable. This is the view held by the ablest religious writers, who assert that where faith abounds, lies and deceptions are wholly unnecessary. Perfect trust in God will overcome any difficulty. We would advise you to read a little book entitled A Lie Never Justifiable, by Henry Clay Trumbull, published by Wattles & Co., Philadelphia.

Hong Kong Harbor, Scene of the Great Typhoon in Which 1,000 Perished

A CABLE dispatch from Hong Kong states that on Monday, July 27, a great typhoon swept the China coast, doing much damage to shipping. It is estimated that 1,000 persons, principally natives, lost their lives in the awful storm. A Chinese steamer, the Ying King, foundered, carrying 300 coolies to the bottom. Several other large steamers are believed to have sunk in the storm. A torpedo boat and a river steamer sank at their wharves. Hundreds of flower boats, junks, cargo boats, sampans and other native craft were destroyed. Several buildings in Hong Kong collapsed, and large trees along the shore front were torn up by the roots.

THE BOOK OF THE HOUR

ALL of our readers who were interested in our editorial last week on "Pole-Hunting in Peary's Own Words," and desire further information regarding his great book NEAREST THE POLE, we refer to the full description of the volume and our SPECIAL OFFER which appeared in our issue of July 29.

Briefly the meat of the advertisement is just this: "Nearest the Pole" is not only the book of the hour, but one of the most thrilling and absorbingly interesting books ever written; the size of the volume—which measures when open 15¼ x 10½ inches, and weighs four pounds—the de luxe paper on which it is printed, the rich, gold stamped binding and the ninety half-tone, sepia engravings—forty-five of which are full pages—all combine to make the book particularly costly in point of manufacture, and the publisher's price is $4.80. Knowing that this is more than many of our readers would care to pay, and in view of the enthusiastic interest in Commander Peary and his present expedition that is creating steadily increasing demand for his famous book, we have made Special Arrangements with the publishers whereby we can offer "Nearest the Pole" to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for less than half price, or for $2.00. We can not, however, prepay express charges. For details, see issue of July 29.

FAIR DAY ON THE LITTLE BIG HORN

NO INSTITUTION is more distinctly American than the Country Fair. Accordingly, the fact that the Crow Indians have adopted the Country Fair may be accepted as strong evidence that the civilization of that once fierce and warlike tribe is advancing. When the aborigines take kindly to ragtime music and pink lemonade, and compete for prizes in exhibitions of mammoth pumpkins, cucumbers and cabbage heads, it is evident that they are following in the path of the white farmers of the Union, in whose estimation Fair Day is the great event of the year. There is little danger that the warrior who has known the joy of seeing his petted rooster win first prize, or of witnessing the decoration of his Holstein heifer with the blue ribbon of excellence, will ever again permit his bronzed features to be disfigured with war paint. The Crows are evidently getting ready for citizenship.

The Third Annual Fair of the Crow Nation was held September 14-18 of last year. Socially, financially and industrially it was an unqualified success. It is anticipated, however, that it will be far eclipsed by this year's event. The precise date of this year's fair has not yet been decided upon, but it will be some time in September. From the viewpoint of sightseers and lovers of the spectacular, the Crow Indian Fair far distances the greatest Wild West exhibition; but its deeper interest and significance lies in the fact that it is evidence that the aborigines have deliberately and forever surrendered the old ways, and that henceforth their ambitions lie along lines of peaceful rivalry with their white fellow citizens.

The annual fairs held at the Crow Agency in Eastern Montana are always attended by large numbers of Blackfeet, Cheyennes, Sioux, Nez Percés, and other tribes of the Northwest. It is, probably, the most representative gathering of the tribes of the Northwest to be seen anywhere. More than 3,000 Indians assemble every year. Each tribe is assigned to a particular station in the general encampment, and there all members of that tribe pitch their teepees. At night the ceremonial dances of each tribe represented are given in large teepees erected for that purpose. The camping ground is approached by a road that leads across the Little Big Horn River. The crossing is effected by means of a footbridge, or a ford for horsemen and vehicles. Here twenty-five cents admission to the camp grounds is collected from all comers.

Every morning at 10 o'clock, the day's entertainment is begun by a parade, from the encampment to the fair grounds. The leader is the herald of old Chief Plenty Coos, head chief of the Crow Nation. The head chief comes second, carrying a large American flag, and followed by a crowd of sub-chiefs and minor dignitaries. Then comes a really excellent brass band, and the rank and file of warriors. Chief Plenty Coos is rendered conspicuous by the absence of barbaric trappings, wearing none of the customary decorations excepting a white the Crow Indian Fair is worth traveling many miles to see. Considered in the light of its historic interest and significance, it is matched by no other annual display in America. Here are the descendants of the first Americans. Many of the warriors in the procession fought Crook, Miles and Custer on more than one hotly contested field. Some participated in the Battle of the Little Big Horn, and no doubt their thoughts revert to that famous field, only three miles away, where they had hoped forever to block the white man's encroachments. These grim old warriors have reached—and passed—the parting of the ways; and their presence in the parade is evidence that they are philosophic enough to bow to the inevitable. Here and there, borne high in the air and flaunting in the breeze, is a string of scalps. In proximity so close that the gruesome relics are often wrapped in its folds, is the American flag. Incongruous, of course; but yet significant. The scalps are old and offensive—nothing but repulsive relics of the past. The flag is bright and new and resplendent—symbolic of the future. And, although the old chiefs and warriors are nearly all gorgeous in war paint and gaily decked out with feathers, blankets and other finery, it is noteworthy that their sons, who bring up the rear, are clean-faced, clear-eyed, and all clothed in the neatly fitting uniforms of the government schools.

The parade passes through each tribal division of the general encampment, and then through the Agency village, where it is reviewed by Indian Agent Reynolds, to whose assistance and encouragement the success of the annual fair must largely be attributed. Then the warriors adjourn for dinner. Immediately after dinner, every one hastens across the Little Big Horn to the fair grounds. The grand prize is given for the neatest and most perfectly appointed teepee. The competing teepees are all equipped and decorated in a manner that proves that the Philistines who think the Indians devoid of artistic perceptions are grossly mistaken. Every conceivable article of native craftsmanship adorns the walls, or is appropriately arranged around the sides.

Close to the teepees in the prize competition is the Exhibition Hall, differing little in its arrangement eagle's feather in his hair. However, the sub-chiefs and warriors are not so modest. Resplendent war bonnets, belts, blankets and savage regalia cover horses and riders, giving to the scene a savage pomp that thrills the hearts of the many old plainmen who witness it. It recalls to their minds similar pageants that they witnessed in years not so long past that their recollection has grown dim, when the assemblage of so many warriors invariably portended strenuous work for the Western army posts, and short shrift for unprotected immigrants caught on the plains.

The Goal of the Soul

TEXT—I. JOHN 3:2—"Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is." R. V.

SAINT JOHN, the author of our text, has been called "the Apostle of the Absolute." In view of the man's character, as set forth in his writings, the title seems to be an eminently fitting one. For whether it be in Gospel, Epistle, or Apocalypse, John, who will be known through time and eternity as the apostle of love, will also be known as the apostle of mighty affirmations, as the man in whose being there is a fine blending of cosmic majesty and spiritual calm, of stormful wrath and peaceful noon, even as the lightning slumbers in a drop of dew. If in John's Gospel we have a summary of Christian theology, in his First Epistle a summary of Christian ethics, in his Apocalypse a summary of Christian politics, we have in each and all of them the martial ring of deathless positives. Nebulous negations did not drop from the tip of John's golden pen. Even his negatives quiver with life, as we shall find in the study of our text.

And so it comes to pass that the subject of John's thinking and writing is life—life in God, or God's life in the soul. His Gospel is a study of the divine life manifested in the person of Christ; his First Epistle is a study of the divine life manifested in the individual Christian; his Apocalypse is a study of the divine life manifested in the universal church. This man of majestic positives, of profound affirmations, is keenly alive to the throbbing pulsations of life—eternal life in the Eternal Son of God. John tells us why he wrote his Gospel—that he might show men the way to eternal life through faith in the incarnate God: "These are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye may have life in his name." John tells us also why he wrote his First Epistle—to confirm and assure those who believe in Christ that now, in this present world, they have eternal life: "These things have I written unto you, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, even unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God."

Just one word more before taking up our text. No true student of this passage will dare to touch it without a feeling that, however much he may be aided by reflection and research and illumination of the Holy Spirit, his treatment of it will be both inadequate and unsatisfying. This feeling arises from the incomparable greatness of the passage in itself, and the train of thought naturally growing out of it. As I read it, these three ideas are set forth: the Known Present, the Unknown Future, and the Satisfying Vision.

I. The Known Present. "Beloved, now are we the children of God." Now if Paul had written this passage, I think it would read this way: "Brethren, now are we the sons of God." For Paul almost invariably considers man's relation to God from the legal standpoint, and so he emphasizes the idea of adoption, which gives a new dignity and relationship to human life. While Paul uses uios (son), which may indicate only adoption and heirship, John uses teknon (child), which denotes a relation based on community of nature. With a single exception, Professor Marvin R. Vincent says, John never uses uios to describe the relations of Christians to God, since he regards their position not as a result of adoption, but of a new life.

Children of God

In view of John's statement that we are children of God, then our first inference, based upon actual fact and experience, is that we are immature, inexperienced, and as yet ungrown. You see John's teaching is this—that even full-grown manhood here is related to the heavenly world as a little child is related to this world. We are only children, the biggest-brained and the largest-souled among us, Moses, Paul, John, Shakespeare, Angelo, Wesley, Gladstone, and all that vast line of immortal thoroughbreds, in the light of the issues involved in the ultimate goal of the soul, are as little children gathering shells, as Sir Isaac Newton put it, along the shore of a sea whose breaking billows lash the outmost confines of infinity. This does not imply that the work of these men, who wrought with tremendous sincerity and holy audacity, is not of permanent worth and of essential value to humanity and the universe. It simply suggests that while in this sphere of being they were engaged in a work whose completion involves such an immense expenditure of eternal energies that they were related to that work as the babe at a mother's breast is related to the problems of empire, of government, of science, of philosophy. We are children, says this man who seemed to see deeper and with clearer eye into things eternal than any mere man in the history of the planet. And, being children, we can not get on without the brooding care of the paternal, yea, the maternal; for childhood, says the dictionary, is that period during which constant maternal care continues to be needed.

Why, in talking with a dear friend, a justly proud and happy grandfather, the other morning, I said: "It was worth a trip across the city to see that beautiful boy." Smiling so broadly that I could almost see the smile through the telephone receiver, he said: "We think he's a fine boy. He left me last night in the storm. But I have his picture here on the desk before my eyes." What would you think of a little child, scarcely old enough to toddle from chair to chair, setting out in the night and the storm from his grandparents' home toward the far-off woods of Maine? Would you not think that that fond grandfather, even though the child's picture lies upon his editorial desk, would be greatly worried about the little fellow's journey? And yet he told me without a quaver in his voice that the child left him in the night and the storm. Shall I tell you why there was no trembling anxiety in that grandfather's voice as he spoke? This is why: he saw the little boy wrapped up snug and warm, folded close to his mother's bosom, and thus he set out upon his journey. My brethren, our apostle says we are children, and your greatest dictionary says childhood is that period during which constant maternal care continues to be needed. Is not our inference just—that in this life that period is veined through and through with the overbrooding care of the paternal and maternal God?

The "New Theology" Excoriated

Our second inference is that John has given us our soul pedigree, our spiritual ancestry. "Now are we the children of God!" When John wrote those words, he foreordained the doom of all mud and dirt philosophy, before it crept from the slime of Darwin's brain, or whined in the mental wilderness of Campbell's nonsense. "In the past thirty-three years," Joseph Parker declared in the City Temple pulpit, whose present occupant was publicly rebuked therein last Thanksgiving Day, "I have seen enough dead theories, exploded nightmares, and discarded hypotheses to fill a good-sized cemetery. They have gone the way of all the earth—dust to dust. They flamboyantly entered the world like an amateur military band, with much noise and swagger, and coughed their way out of it like a squad of consumptive tramps. Whenever a preacher is parading a new and sparkling theory in religion, I know the first nail in his coffin has been driven and clinched. The one thing that is forever new and fresh is the old Christian Evangel, which is in fact from everlasting to everlasting."

And so, John says, we are children of God; not children of fate, nor children of accident, nor children of a primeval orang-outang. Learn a lesson from a four-year-old child. On a recent Saturday forenoon our boy decided that I must give him a trip to the Brooklyn Museum. With wondering delight we went from department to department. I tried to interest him in the pictures. But his artistic sense was soon satisfied. Boylike he said: "Papa, I want to see the animals, and the soldiers, and the guns." So I showed him the coats of mail, the Japanese and Chinese collections, the giant mastodon, the large and small reptiles, the wild boars, the massive whale, the eagles and their mountain home—in fact, I tried to show him everything to be seen. Finally, as we were approaching the glass case containing that magnificent specimen of the orang-outang, I said: "Now, Frederick, I want to introduce you to your grandfather." It was indeed pathetic to see the expression on his little face, the shifting playground of repulsive frown and childish incredulity, as he gazed at the savage ape holding the huge club in his ferocious grasp. He found his tongue at last and said: "Why, papa, I can't believe that he is my grandfather. He don't look one bit like my grandpa." "But, my child," I said, "in order to be thoroughly scientific, but not necessarily Biblical, you have to believe that that gallant and fascinating gentleman is your grandfather, or, any rate, is your ancestor." Again he answered: "Papa, I just can't believe it." Nor as yet has his father learned to believe it. Perhaps I might, if I undertook to color my theological imagination, as Da Vinci colored his artistic imagination before painting the head of the Medusa. As a preparation for his ghastly task, the painter captured a brood of venomous, swelling toads. After taking them to his house and tormenting them into a rage, he watched them until his imagination was soaked in the hideous sight. Then Da Vinci, with his imagination dipped in the poison of those venomous toads, put the Medusa on canvas. Let him who will so color his theological imagination in apeshood until he can trace his unbroken lineage back to the anthropoid but Christians ought to find it more edifying to accept Saint John's ancestral doctrine: "Beloved, now are we the children of God!" Here is that "missing link" which, if scientists had looked in the right place, would have been found long ago!

What the Future Holds

II. The Unknown Future. "And it is not yet made manifest what we shall be." This what, says Bengel, suggests something unspeakable, contained in the likeness of God. And I hold it to be a sure mark of greatness that John does not attempt to analyze and express what this "what" of my text really is. He says, not unmindful for a single moment of the life, death, resurrection and ascension of Christ, that "there has never been set forth before men's eyes, in this earthly life of ours, an example or an instance of what the sons of God are to be in another state of being." Is it not the acme of wisdom to leave unexpressed the inexpressible, as John does? To undertake to describe "what" we shall be in another life would be like the buried root of the wild orchid descending upon the brilliant rose, or white, or yellow, or lilac flower of the tame orchid, glowing with perfect beauty and queenly majesty in the Prospect Park hot-house; like the chrysalis, before leaving its caterpillar state, telling what it would resemble when it became that winged splendor named the butterfly; like the white, spotted, scrawled eggs lying in their hanging nest and talking to each other of the day when they would be a flock of winging, singing, golden orioles. Let us rejoice that the "Lord Jesus Christ shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory;" but let us remember, also, that that conformity is so far beyond the radiant dreams of humanity as it now is, so utterly grand and absolutely great that John says it was never manifested on any occasion what we shall be!

And just here, says Dr. Alexander MacLaren, are two things to be grateful for. In the first place, we should be thankful that we do not know, "for the ignorance is the sign of the greatness." John says we are children, and being children, ignorance is the natural process in the course of our development. You are a banker. Suppose that you bend over the cradle of your baby boy and say: "My child, you will be the king of financiers. You will make Wall Street tremble by your tread. When a panic strikes our country you will be able to take up the bonds and help to relieve the stringency." If a man had so far lost his head as to talk such nonsense to a baby, why, nature would protect the child in answering the father with a prattle and a smile. You ought to thank God that your child can't understand such talk. For if he could understand it, babyhood would be robbed of its innocence, boyhood would be deprived of its joys, growing into manhood would be cheated of its dreams and aspirations. Would you turn the sweet, laughing face of a little child into the wrinkled, withered, wizened face of an old man? No! It would be unnatural. First an infant, then a boy, then a man! According to my text, we are in our spiritual childhood in this life. It is wonderful, it is glorious, it is perfectly adapted to us; but we are children, nevertheless, and we ought to be thankful for the unrevealed glories which will come to us in another world.

In the second place, this very blending of knowledge and ignorance is God's secret of growing a soul. Our Father knows us altogether, and it is one of the marks of his love toward us that he guards us against the peril of over-familiarity with divine things. We know by experience how over-familiarity

The Mission Boat at Anchor in Cebu Harbor

A Carabao Cart

THE day after mailing you my last letter I received a telegram notifying me of the arrival of our new mission boat El Heraldo Cristiano, which was purchased with the gifts of your readers and others specially for the Philippine work. The trim little vessel came on the steamship Dacre Castle, and I immediately set out to receive it, taking three days to cover the distance.

On my arrival, I found that the launch had already been lowered into the water and had been given into the care of my fellow missionaries here, Dr. Graham and Mr. Dunlop. It had arrived in perfect condition, thanks to the great care taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD management to insure its safe transport. There was not a single leakage. After a thorough cleaning and a new coat of paint, she looks a beauty, and is much admired by everybody. The freight charge, however, is appalling. We are praying that the kind readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who have helped us to get the boat, will continue to contribute so that the whole cost may be met. Last Friday, we took the mission boat out on a trial trip. An American friend who has a small gasoline launch of his own accompanied us to show us how she ought to be run. Our destination was Dumaguete, on the neighboring island of Negros, where we wanted to carry five native young men, who are students there. The gasoline engine was easily started, but after a while acted poorly and finally stopped, when we were about twenty miles out. We put our heads together and studied her, inside and out; but for nearly twelve hours we were only rewarded with a few spasmodic "chug-chugs."

Then she again started going, but in such a half-hearted way that we concluded we had better go back to Cebu for expert advice. Another American friend, who has charge of the electric light plant here, kindly offered to go with us for this second trial trip. After a little attention to batteries and plugs El Heraldo Cristiano sailed off grandly, and for the eighty miles going and eighty coming back the engine did not miss a stroke. She goes about seven and one-half knots (between eight and nine miles) an hour, and seems quite moderate in consumption of gasoline. Mrs. Jansen and I have already taken up our quarters on her for summer mission work, and wish you all could know how much comfort she is giving us, while at the same time trebling our capacity for service. We thank you and all your good readers most heartily, only words seem inadequate for the occasion. However, you and they have done it for love of the Master, and he will not forget.

Even the boards in which the boat was crated came in wonderfully handy. We needed an extension to our little church here, and part of the new walls, at least, are composed of the boards that incased the boat. Kindly assure Captain Benn of our appreciation of all his efforts, and his kind practical directions contained in a late letter. I would like much to write each and every one who helped in this enterprise; but time will not allow me, so I ask them to take the will for the deed.

Some kind friend put a box full of CHRISTIAN HERALDS on the mission boat, and you can never know how many solitary hearts will be cheered with them. Reading matter is at a premium in these islands, especially good reading matter. We would be most grateful for a regular supply. Now finally, dear friends, don't forget to pray that God will use your boat and his servants to the glory of himself and to the eternal salvation of thousands in these islands.

tends to dull the wonder of the wonderful. Last summer I watched two persons in the cab of a monster freight engine. One was an engineer, the other was a boy. Of course every natural, healthy boy wants to be an engineer, and it would be impossible for him to picture a heaven as beautiful as that gigantic pile of steel and copper and iron on wheels. With wonder-teeming eyes the boy beheld the fire-box, the air-brake, the steam gauge, the rope that rings the bell, and above all the throttle, which held for him the mystery of a thousand worlds! As he looked out upon the net-work of tracks he seemed to say to himself: "If I could just pull that throttle open, I wonder which one of those tracks this old iron-horse would take!" But there wasn't a single gleam of wonder in the eye of the engineer. He was perfectly familiar with both engine and track, and he was glad to have a rest-day. If I wanted to have a vast deal of soul fun, I would go to a certain spot I know away off in the mountains, whose inhabitants never saw a village, much less a great city. From that primitive country I would bring my two boy friends, Reuben and Jasper, to New York. It would be worth the cost to see their expression when we reached Fifth Avenue. Jasper would say, in his homely vernacular: "Mister, ain't you brung us to Heaven?" Of course I wouldn't be cruel enough to tell him that Fifth Avenue was so much unlike heaven that it might have a slight resemblance to the other place. Fancy the wonder in their eyes as they saw the Singer Building and exclaimed: "That loft surely is higher than the moon." Crossing the bridge and seeing the crowd of worn-outs who congregate there every summer morning, perhaps my little friends would say: "Guess these poor fellers ain't got no mothers." Oh, the dazzling wonder of this great world of New York to my little friends who are unfamiliar with it! Oh, the tragedy of the man whose over-familiarity with life and divine things has deadened his soul eyes to their mystery and glory!

Let us not lose the wonder, my friends. Now we are children, ignorant and immature; but we are going to be God's completed, eternal, immortal grown-ups one of these days, though it doth not yet appear just what we shall be!

III. The Satisfying Vision. "We know that, when he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him even as he is." While our text does not go into details about the life to come, believe me when I say that it here emphasizes the all-important character of that life. "We shall be like him"—here is the ultimate goal of the soul. To be like him—this, my friends, is the one thing that will satisfy the soul and justify the creation of the universe. To be like him—that will be glory enough for kings and queens, heroes and martyrs, saints and sages, men and angels! To be like him—that will excel the beauty of silver and gold, earth and sea, suns and stars! To be like him—that will turn every tear into laughter, every sob into song, every loss into gain! To be like him—that will transform sorrow into joy, defeat into triumph, death into life!

And so, my brethren, I am not thinking this morning of the wrecks scattered along the highway of these human years. I am not thinking of the spiritual defeats, the cups of sorrow, the broken purposes, the slain hopes, the killed aspirations that lie entombed in the invisible morgue of the soul. I am not thinking of the faltering steps that clamber up the last milestone of the long life-hill. I am not thinking of unquiet hearts that remember in the night, when a steady rain of tears beats upon the darkened roof of the soul and runs off into the unscattered, unlighted glooms of life. I am not thinking of that deadly, benumbing ache which tugs at the heart until we sometimes wonder if there is a physician who can replace the crimson stitches of pain by the white stitches of peace. I am not thinking of the tired backs, the unappeased longings, the whirling mysteries that send their monotonous dirges through the warp and woof of our being. I am not thinking of the misunderstandings that separate, of the unkindnesses that stab more keenly than cold steel, of the hatreds that chill and then kill "the genial currents of the soul." I am not thinking of the wasted bodies of the godly father, the saintly mother, the knightly son, the lovely daughter, the radiant friend, which we have put away in God's acre. No, dear hearts, standing in the golden glory of this promise that we shall be like him, I am thinking of that stainless universe, of that perfected humanity, of that sunless, nightless, tearless City of the Soul, whose king "is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of all creation; for in him were all things created, in the heavens and upon the earth, things visible and things invisible, whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers; all things have been created through him and unto him; and he is before all things, and in him all things hold together." And so I ask you to think with me of the Eternal Son, who is that Infinite Beyond, on the other side of which there is no beyond, the glorified Christ who shall at last present a glorified humanity unto the Father, "that God may be all in all!"

GODMOTHER OF THE W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Sophia E. Sanford
Who christened the W. C. T. U.

THE Civil War was, in a way, the greatest calamity which ever befell us as a nation. In another way it was the mother of innumerable blessings. One of these was the awakening of our noble women to the consciousness that they had duties to perform for their country as well as for their homes. They had organized auxiliaries to the great Sanitary and Christian Commissions, and other vast societies for helping the soldiers; and in every little town in every State groups of loyal women were gathered together, scraping lint, packing "comfort-bags," and compounding dainties.

Most of these little circles had to organize, and thus the bright, active, educated women of America learned, more keenly than they had ever learned before, the joys of working in concert, methodically and for great ends.

The war ceased, but the women saw that there were still evils to be cured. In the little town of Fredonia, N. Y., Dr. Dio Lewis on Sunday, December 14, 1873, told of the wonderful work which had been accomplished in checking intemperance in his own town of Clarksville. The women there had banded themselves together and had gone to the saloons, singing and praying, and begging the liquor dealers to forsake their wicked business, and the men who frequented their places to keep away.

Among the women in Dr. Lewis's audience was Sophia E. Sanford, the wife of Henry R. Sanford, one of the leading men of Fredonia. Like everyone else who had heard Dr. Lewis's impassioned address, she was profoundly stirred. A meeting was called for the following morning and three hundred citizens were present. The men pledged thousands of dollars for the expenses of a temperance campaign. The women withdrew to a lower room, and arranged the details of a march which should be similar to that of the women of Clarksville. At half past twelve that day, the procession of fine-looking women, headed by Mrs. Barker, the wife of a highly respected judge, and Mrs. Williams, the wife of the Baptist minister, started forth on their errand of reform. More than a hundred women followed. Among these and walking were Mrs. Jane Clemens, the mother of Mark Twain, and Mrs. Sanford.

By KATE UPSON CLARK

In one of Mrs. Sanford's recent letters, she wrote: "With the consent of the proprietors, we entered the saloons, sang Christian hymns, prayed, and pleadingly besought the men not to drink and the saloonkeepers not to sell."

They were everywhere courteously treated. For several weeks, they continued their daily visitations. The result, much to their joy, was that Fredonia became a no-license town.

Naturally, the good women who had perfected this work decided to form a permanent organization. Mrs. Esther McNeil, still a resident of Fredonia, was chosen president, and Mrs. Sanford secretary. The latter was appointed a committee of one to draft a constitution and by-laws. No suggestion had been made regarding a name for the club, but "there, in my own home," wrote Mrs. Sanford, "I decided to call the society the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, little dreaming of the marvelous development which was to grow from that beginning."

The life of this noble temperance worker was that of the typical American woman. She was born October 17, 1835, in the quaint hamlet of Dresden, the justices of the New York Supreme Court, who walked in her funeral procession.

In 1861, she was married to a husband whose intellectual tastes were the same as her own, and who is now the senior institute director of the New York State Education Department. She was the mother of six children, four of whom are still living.

As her children grew up, Mrs. Sanford was anxious to indulge her intellectual tastes to the full. Always deeply interested in history, she founded a small history club, in which she and her choicest friends took great delight. She was intensely patriotic, and was a member of the Seneca Falls Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution. She was devoted to music and knew and loved the best. She considered flowers as living friends, and in the same way as in all the beauties of nature, she revealed wisdom and uplifting joy.

But it was in her home, her church, her religion that her deepest life lay. She was active in the cause of missions, and to the end, the temperance cause enlisted her ardent sympathies. Her modest soul keenly rejoiced, even while she deprecated the fame which her fortunate choice had brought her, that she had devised the appropriate and expressive title borne by our greatest temperance organization.

Lovely and unselfish in disposition, she bore the long months of her last painful illness with exemplary fortitude, and her last words were of thought for the comfort of others. Then she slept, and it was the sleep that knows no awaking. On the morning of July 1, they who spoke to her received no answer, and they saw upon her face the seal of the angel who comes to each soul but once.

It is given to but few to achieve like Mrs. Sanford a specific work which is to endure; but every town and village in our land contains earnest and loving women, true to their religion and their homes, and using every spare moment in efforts to make better the world around them. They are the characteristic American women, and the foreigners who come to "study" us and our institutions, and who go home with elaborate and highly colored accounts of our "smart set," our politicians and our commerce, know nothing of the real motive-power behind our progress. Our "smart set" do our playing for us; our politicians are the men we hire to keep our government machinery going; our commerce typifies our physical organization; but back of it all lies the heart of our country—these noble and devoted Christian men and women who in every community, large and small, are laboring to make the world better. Of these, and crowned as well with an abiding fame, is Sophia Elizabeth Sanford. She rests from her labors, but her works do follow her, and in the hearts of her Christian countrywomen her name will be ever wreathed about with love and honor.

and contents from similar structures in New England or the Middle States. Here are turnips, beets, potatoes, cabbages, cucumbers, squash, and every fruit, vegetable and cereal that grows in the Northwest. Near at hand is a section in which the dusky squaws display their skill in drawn work, bead work, lace, embroidery, needlework and other feminine accomplishments. Just outside is the poultry division, with ducks, chickens, geese, turkeys, and pigeons; and near by are sleek steers and lithe-limbed broncos of the live stock department. Just a characteristic exhibition of the products of farm, garden, orchard and ranch, in no way superior to similar displays at country fairs the whole country over, but noteworthy because every article shown represents some division of Indian industry. One can stand in the doors of the Exhibition Hall, and see the frowning bluffs of the Little Big Horn. With the aid of a glass of ordinary power, he can distinguish the shaft of the Custer Monument. The Indians are proverbially reticent, and random questions addressed to the warriors rarely elicit much information; but any white plainsman in the throng will point out many a grizzled brave who participated in the famous fight of thirty-two years ago, when the Seventh Cavalry and its dashing leader went down before the overwhelming numbers of their red foes.

Next to old Chief Plenty Coos, the most interesting character regularly in attendance at the Crow Indian Fair is Curly, General Custer's favorite Indian scout—the only member of Custer's command who survived the disastrous battle of the Little Big Horn. Simply because he lived to tell the tale, many refuse to believe that Curly was ever in the fight at all. However, his story of the battle was circumstantial and was corroborated by every fact that afterwards came to light; and the Crows, Sioux, Cheyennes and other tribesmen who participated in Crazy Horse's victory seem to give full credit to Curly's claim.

Chief Two-Leggings Crossing the Little Big Horn

At night come the tribal dances. Learned professors of the Bureau of Ethnology and impecunious scribblers for the Sunday supplements have tried so often and failed so lamentably in the attempt to describe the Indian dances that it is useless to add another failure to the list. A hundred feet or less from the tent where the tom-tom keeps time to the rhythmic dance of the warriors is a phonograph that blares forth ragtime and the latest Bowery hits. Coon songs and the latest music hall airs blend strangely with savage cadences that were old centuries before the Pilgrims set foot on the rock of Plymouth. The past and present meet and mingle strangely here, where the Red Race signifies the surrender of everything it used to hold as rendering life tolerable. Yet what the thoughts are that are veiled behind those stoical countenances, no white man can say.

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. Naomi A. Gould, of Fenwick, Mich., has been called to her eternal home, after a faithful Christian life.

The Methodist Episcopal Church of Nelson, Pa., has lost a firm friend, death having claimed Freeman D. Pierce. He passed to his reward at the age of sixty-seven years. He faithfully served his country during the war of the rebellion in Company L, Second Pennsylvania Cavalry. He faithfully served the church of his choice as class leader. Those who know him best testify that he ever lived as a devoted Christian.

QUEBEC'S PAGEANT OF CENTURIES

Champlain and His Wife

Cavalcade of King Francis I. at Fontainebleau

Captain and Mate of the "Don de Dieu"

MANY leaves in the history of Canada and of North America were turned back at the recent tercentennial at Quebec, and the great characters who once paced the mediæval streets seemed to be called once more to life. Mingling with the twentieth century tourists who were there in thousands, were Indians in war-paint and feathers walking as haughtily as their ancestors must have done in the days when they were lords of the north "before the white man came." Here and there would appear a herald at arms in embroidered tabard, and a man of the watch carrying helmet and breast-plate as easily as if he had worn them all his life. Highlanders in kilts, red-coated soldiers and courtiers of the reign of Francis I. gave pleasing touches of color to the passing throng.

On "Champlain Day," at three in the afternoon, the Don de Dieu, Champlain's ship, sailed up to the port canting in the stiff breeze. The crew was composed of Quebec yachtsmen dressed in the sailor costume of 1608. As soon as shore was reached Sheriff Langelier, as Champlain, led his men ashore and they entered the "Habitation," a replica of the first building in Quebec.

The historical procession which followed was composed of three thousand Indians, courtiers and men and women representing such famous characters as Francis I. and court, King Henry IV., and court ladies, Cartier, Champlain, Count Frontenac, Montcalm and Wolfe, with soldiers and sailors.

Probably nothing finer of its kind has been seen here or abroad than the pageant given on the Plains. The people of Quebec had been preparing for months and the result was beyond their fondest hopes. Fully four thousand people dressed as historic personages took part and so accurately were the various parts taken that one had difficulty at times to realize that it was the twentieth century and that they were not really seeing the great historic events themselves. For instance, the Sheriff of Quebec took the part of Champlain, and he made up so well that he was a perfect copy of the explorer's portrait. Other characters were copied with the same fidelity.

The tableau representing the court of Henry IV. of France at Fontainebleau made a brilliant scene, courtiers, nobles, halbardiers, and ladies in waiting taking their parts in the beautiful picture. Other scenes represented were Cartier's meeting with the Indians, Dollard and his famous sixteen who saved Canada from the Iroquois, and Count Frontenac receiving the envoy of Phipps, who besieged the city in 1690 with a fleet from New England. The Count replied to the messenger that he would send his entire week as a guest of the city, as was also a member of the Wolfe family. The chief of Clan Frazer was also present, wearing the full Highland costume. It was the Frazer Highlanders who played such an important part in taking the city.

The review of the massed troops on the historic Plains of Abraham by the Prince of Wales was a stirring spectacle. Lined up on the plains, not far from Wolfe's Cove, were twenty thousand troops, many more than fought on this same ground for the mastery of Canada.

There were regiments of redcoats, grenadiers and plaided Highlanders—their war pipes shrieking shrilly—hussars, and a noteworthy detachment of the famous mounted police from the Northwest. Fully thirty thousand spectators crowded to the edge of the reviewing ground and the roads leading to it were so packed with people as to be almost impassable. The Prince was dressed in the scarlet uniform of a field marshal, his white helmet topped with red and white feathers; across his breast was the blue ribbon of the Order of the Garter. The Prince and Earl Roberts galloped along the lines. The colors were dipped, the bugles blared, and then the lines shifted into column and marched past. The French soldiers came first as representing the founders of the country, and next came five hundred marines and sailors from the battleship New Hampshire. Their alignment was perfect and they marched with a swing that brought a storm of applause from the spectators. Vice-President Fairbanks and his military staff occupied seats in the reviewing stands and joined in the cheers. The American sailors looked very natty in their white duck hats and yellow leggings. After the march past there was a brief ceremony in the reviewing stand. The Prince presented to Earl Grey the title deeds to the Plains of Abraham, which, hitherto private property, then passed into the ownership of the nation. At a banquet later the Prince gave a check of $100,000 to keep the battlefield in proper condition. After the review the Prince placed wreaths on the Wolfe monument and then on the shaft of St. Foye erected by the French, with its simple yet forceful inscription "Aux Braves," thus paying equal tribute to the two races of Canada.

answer from the mouth of his cannon. One of the most effective scenes was Wolfe and his troops and Montcalm with his white-coated grenadiers of France. These two had been greatly cheered during the procession through the streets of the city, the English cheering loudly as Wolfe rode by and the French shouting themselves hoarse for the Marquis de Montcalm. The young Count de Montcalm, a descendant of the general, was present the

The Peace Congress

THEY are but a little flock—the Peace Lovers. When they met in London, a few days ago, for the Seventeenth Universal Peace Congress, they seemed a very insignificant assemblage, although they represented sixteen different nations and governments. Their speeches, advising the workers of the world to refuse to take up arms wherever a quarrel could be settled by international arbitration, had a strange sound in these days of martial clangor, when the world's rulers are supplementing their armed hosts with death-dealing fleets that cover the seas.

Yet, although the old world may seem to be more like a noisy armed camp than ever, the Peace Lover finds comfort in the fact that there is an undertone which tells of hope. He knows that the time will yet come when "the science of destruction shall bend before the arts of peace," and when the enlightened peoples will no longer hold each other as enemies, but as friends and brothers. In the great changes that are now taking place, the thoughtful may discern the influence of a divine hand directing the destinies of the nations. Within the space of a single lifetime, we have seen France a monarchy and now a republic; Spain a kingdom, a republic, and again a kingdom; Brazil an empire and now a republic; Russia a despotism and now a constitutional government, while the ancient despotisms of Persia and Turkey are even now in the throes of political and constitutional rebirth. We have seen the hostile Central American States banded together for peace. Over thirty leading nations have gathered at the council table, pledged to adjust their quarrels peaceably, rather than with sword and cannon.

It is true, universal peace and brotherhood may still be a dream of the far future; but the real Peace Lover knows by the signs that the old world is moving toward it, though slowly. His hope is strong, because he can see that the olive tree is spreading, roots and branches. And he knows that within the brief span of one human life, great things have happened and more substantial progress has been made toward the ultimate goal than in the ten preceding centuries.

The Militant Suffragettes

WENDELL PHILLIPS used to tell us that, in spite of the old proverb, "Talk is cheap," it is the first essential to reform; that the minds of people must be accustomed to the word pictures of the "agitator" before the real objects could be safely plumped upon them. This is apparently the idea of the fighting suffragettes in England. They are "agitating" violently and the whole world is looking on and listening.

The Rev. Canon Hicks, who is warmly in sympathy with the suffrage movement, thinks that the worst is now over and that their success is in sight. He considers that the experience of New Zealand and other countries, in which woman suffrage has been given a fair trial, justifies the rest of the world in granting it also. But it is a notable fact that one's personal opinion seems to color the facts in such cases. Those who do not believe in woman suffrage profess to find results directly contrary to those reported by the good Canon. Thus, concerning the recent fraudulent registration of 2,000 women in Colorado, Ellis Meredith, the well-known and highly respected writer, declares that, after a thorough investigation, she finds only three. This is a terrible shrinkage. Both stories seem incredible—and one knows not what to believe.

Even the warmest friends of the woman suffrage movement shudder to read of the storming of Mr. Asquith's windows by two London suffragists, who alighted from a taxicab, armed with bags of missiles. Two panes were broken (which argues a surer aim than some attribute to the sex), and the offenders were sentenced to two months at hard labor. At the great "demonstration" in Parliament Square, following the refusal of the Prime Minister to grant an interview, twenty-nine of the ladies, persisting in haranguing the crowds after they had been forbidden to do so, were locked up and sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from one to three months. They can pay fines instead, if they choose, but "most of them," says the Christian World, "elect to go to prison."

One English publication is printing a series of witty "interviews," probably spurious, but very funny, in which a violent opponent of the suffragettes voices the ancient cry about the neglected home and the ruined children. He says, "Women must stay at home. England is being desolated by these roaming and ranging maidens, wives and mothers, who are basking in the glare of publicity instead of sweeping, dusting, sewing, cooking and 'tending baby' at home, as they should."

It is hard for even those who sympathize with their opinions to understand the aggressive and law-defying attitude of the English suffragettes; but they are mainly good women, highly educated and well brought up, and should not be condemned without a hearing.

The Epidemic of Summer Crime

DOCTORS and criminologists are again taking up the study of the connection of great heat waves and crimes of violence. This summer, the list of brutal tragedies has already become a long one and the most crimes appear to have been committed when the temperature rose highest. The same phenomenon has been noticed by scientific men for a number of years and they believe there is a connection between the two. Although this is probably true to a certain extent, one reason why there is more crime is undoubtedly the fact that there is far greater opportunity for the commission of crime in summer than in winter. People leave their doors and windows open to get fresh air, this being often done in neighborhoods remote from police protection.

People lured by the charm of unfrequented by-paths in the country take rambles in localities where hold-ups or murder for the sake of robbery may be accomplished without great fear, on the part of the desperadoes, of subsequent detection. The majority of people who are waylaid have been taking walks in the evening without adequate protection or escort. The papers West and East show that the conditions are practically the same at this time of the year. It is unfortunate that criminals are most active when people need recreation more than at any other time. It does not mean, however, that the American people are growing more lawless. The reason given recently by the chief of police of one of our greatest cities is that the country is being flooded with criminals from Europe, who, finding that their careers in their own countries have been cut short by the activity of the police, have come to America for the purpose of carrying on their nefarious practices. The desperadoes who shot several people in the quiet streets of a suburban part of Boston are said to be men with foreign criminal records. America has always welcomed the deserving; but, for self-protection, she must watch carefully her gates and see that only those who are worthy are admitted. They must know that freedom does not mean license.

Our Sunday School

THOSE who imagine that the Sunday School is losing its hold upon the youth of the country need only turn to the reports read before the recent National Convention at Louisville, to find encouragement, and to learn the true condition of affairs. A net gain of 1,000,000 scholars in three years; new schools starting up at the rate of fourteen per day; over 9,000 teachers' meetings regularly maintained (an increase of over twelve per cent. since last report), and a grand total of 15,000,000 pupils enrolled in all the grades—these are statistics that ought to inspire superintendents, teachers and parents everywhere to increased zeal and still more earnest effort.

The Sunday School is the moral backbone of the nation. In these days, when attempts are made in many places to exclude the Bible and all religious teaching from the public schools, the preservation of the Sunday School is of the highest importance. It is a vital factor in the training of our children for Christian manhood and womanhood. By precept and example in the Christian home, and by the excellent modern system of teaching which now prevails in Sunday Schools generally, the foundation of character are laid, and proper direction is given to the child's whole nature. There is no time so favorable to the right kind of spiritual development as childhood, and no place so fitting for making start for the road that leads to true happiness as the Sunday School. It should be a fold for the tender lambs, a feeder for the greater church, a nurseries ground for the gardens of heaven.

Be loyal to the Sunday School. Support it, starve it, give it the benefit of your presence and influence. And count it as one of your absolute duties if you have children, to have them there; for it is the hope of the nation and of all Christendom.

The Reading Habit

CURIOUSLY, the inquiry, What have you been reading? disconcerts a great many people. The possibly may be by the way of reading a good many books, but if suddenly asked about the matter, they will probably have a little difficulty in remembering the particular books they have lately read and will say rather vaguely, "Not much of anything." They are much in the condition of folk who are suddenly asked in company to repeat a text of Scripture. Very likely they know hundreds of texts, but on the instant memory proves treacherous and they cannot think of one. Thus it is when one tries to recall the name of the last book read and to give a little sketch of its author and drift.

There are hundreds of people whose reading is confined to the newspaper, the cook-book and the Bible. Yet as this is supposed to be a reading age and new books are constantly advertised, while the old standards do not lose their charm, we ought to be able to give a good report on this subject if cross examined. The book that everybody is reading we should as a rule know something about. The history of our own country we can not afford to ignore. We should at least have some friendly acquaintance with biography, science and books of travel.

Among the Workers

—TENT EVANGEL, the Gospel Tabernacle at Fifty-seventh Street and Broadway, New York, is doing good service this summer under the management of G. W. MacPherson. It seats 2,000 and the meetings are generally crowded.

—THE EVANGELISTIC COMMITTEE of New York City is finding stereopticon pictures very helpful in holding the attention of children and in impressing Scripture lessons on the minds of adults as well, in tent-work and in the open air. The Committee would be glad to receive gifts of lantern slides of religious subjects, hymns, etc., which may be sent to them at headquarters, 541 Lexington Avenue, New York City.

—THE FOURTEENTH ANNUAL BIBLE CONFERENCE takes place at Winona Lake, Ind., August 16 to 25. The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman is director. Among the prominent speakers are "Gipsy" Smith, the famous English Evangelist; Dr. W. L. Watkins, of London, England; the Rev. Dr. A. K. Bishop Hartzell; Dr. C. L. Goodell, New York; Dr. W. J. Dawson, London, and others. The music will be in charge of Charles M. Alexander, Prof. E. O. Excell, Charles F. Allen, and Mr. Harkness, of Australia.

President Castro

The Dutch Cruiser "Gelderland"

La Guayra, Threatened with Bombardment

An International Quarrel

PRESIDENT CASTRO, who takes himself seriously as the strenuous president and protector of the liberties of his people, keeps his and other nations that have to do with him in constant hot water by his unwise and rash acts. He has just driven M. de Reus, the Minister of The Netherlands to Venezuela, from the capital. The reason for the summary action Castro gave was the public statement of M. de Reus that Castro had ruined Venezuela. The Dutch cruiser Gelderland, which brought the expelled minister from Caracas, was ordered back at once to Puerto Cabello to protect the Dutch interests in Venezuela. In herself, she is not a very formidable fighting vessel, as she has only 3,950 tons displacement and her largest guns are two six-inch pieces of forty calibre; but the deep anger of the nation back of her and the concurrent wish of the world that Castro might be rebuked—the wish being shared by our own government—make the presence of that cruiser significant. But this ship will be reinforced by armed and cruising ships if their presence shall prove necessary. On paper, Venezuela's naval strength looks quite formidable, but its total tonnage does not approximate that of the single cruiser Gelderland. Most of the Netherlands ships are usually in East Indian waters, but a number of the larger and more heavily armed craft are in home waters at present and available for service in this emergency. The action of Castro so deeply enraged the Dutch people that when the Venezuelan minister was driven from The Hague, the people mobbed him and governmental protection was necessary to save his life. Despite the warlike fever in both nations, it is likely that the pen of diplomacy and not the bullet of war will settle this dispute. It may be possible that the Netherlands will have to make some show of force to bring Castro to his senses—a course that other nations have taken in the past.

At this time, when national and international peace congresses are being held, when good will amongst individuals and peoples is sought and cultivated, the progress of the world will be better served by settling petty questions of policy by prudence and principle, rather than by prejudice and passion.

The wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it. (Prov. 16: 14.)

World's Peace Congress

On July 27 the International Peace Congress opened its 17th annual session in Caxton Hall, London, under the presidency of the Rt. Rev. Dr. John William Diggle, bishop of Carlisle, with a discussion on Christianity and peace. The King and Queen received the deputation of twenty-four delegates at Buckingham Palace. In the course of his reply to their address, King Edward said: "There is nothing from which I would derive more sincere gratification than the knowledge that my efforts in the cause of international peace and good will had not been without fruit." After the reception at the Palace, Rev. B. F. Trueblood, General Secretary of the American Peace Society, spoke appreciatively of the King's sympathy. He contrasted the favorable auspices under which the Congress met, with conditions prevailing at the Congress in London in 1890. He could not have believed then that there would now be 500 peace societies at work. He looked forward to the time when wars would cease and national difficulties be settled by arbitration. The Japanese delegates are very hopeful regarding the permanent peace of the Far East. The subjects of the Prince of Peace throughout the world are very happy at the unmistakable signs of the triumph of peace and good will among men.

And the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. (Isa. 9: 6.)

Negro Girl Wins a Prize

At a convention of the National Educational Association, held in Cleveland, O., recently, there was an international spelling championship contest in the Hippodrome. The Cleveland team of fifteen won the city championship, easily defeating teams of Pittsburg, New Orleans and Erie, Pa. Out of the five hundred words submitted, Cleveland pupils missed only forty. The feature of the contest was the winning of the medal by a little negro girl, Marie Bolden, the 14-year-old daughter of a Cleveland mail carrier. The girl had not missed a single word. President Haserot called the child to the front of the stage and, amid the cheers of the audience, gave her the gold badge signifying that she is the champion speller of the best team in the United States. What a great country this is in which we live, where the child of a race under the ban of prejudice, handicapped by comparative poverty, through the advantage of our public school system and the careful training of a home, is enabled to take such a prize indicating intellectual and educational superiority.

When wisdom entereth into thine heart, and knowledge is pleasant unto thy soul. (Prov. 2: 10.)

West Point Expels Hazers

Eight West Point cadets, two of them first classmen, were found guilty of hazing by a board of officers appointed by Col. Hugh L. Scott, Superintendent of the United States Military Academy, and their dismissal has been recommended to the Secretary of War. The type of hazing, which has been named "fall in," was practised upon the 125 plebes. This regulation was enforced so secretly that not a single cadet knew anything was wrong until the news leaked out that an investigation was on foot. The hazing had been going on a month or more before the authorities awoke to the fact. When a plebe violated the warning drum regulation and failed to "fall in" promptly, he had to be punished by these hazers. The upper classmen would say: "Go out into G Company Street and pick up a hundred nice fat ants, put them in your cap, and in half an hour come back, count them, and if any are absent report accordingly. If all are present or accounted for put them in your locker until further orders." If the poor plebe corralled his ants, if he had the right number he put them in his locker; if he lacked any he was compelled to get fifty additional ones and sometimes would have to run about an eighth of a mile back and forth until ordered to halt. Still another form of hazing was ordered at meal times, and the plebe who could go through with that one was a wonder. This form of torture, which took place in the Cadet Mess Hall, required the plebe, when he sat down at table, to place the tips of his toes against the bottom of the table, and eat in that almost impossible position until, at a signal from one of his tormentors, he was permitted to resume a natural attitude. At other times such athletic "stunts" as chinning and standing on one foot for ten or fifteen minutes at a time were resorted to. One of the first classmen was more cruel than the rest. He compelled the plebes to care for his room and when their services did not please him he would strike them in anger. Whatever may have been the impression of hazing in the past or amongst old graduates of the Military Academy, the hazing of to-day is foolish and, under the federal legislation, disloyal. Very many worse things than these have been done. It is feared that health and some lives have been sacrificed to the custom. The United States government has, for a number of years, determined that hazing should cease at West Point, and while it is a pity that young men of ability and character, who would make good officers in the army, should suffer this disgrace, the government is perfectly right in its determination to stop hazing, and the authorities at West Point deserve the congratulation of the whole country in their determination to enforce the acts of Congress upon the subject.

This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice. (Deut. 21: 20.)

Miss Ethel Wheeler Becomes a Missionary

Miss Ethel J. Wheeler, daughter of Everett P. Wheeler, a child of wealth and culture, has just left her home in New York for the life of a missionary in China. She will apply her own private income to her mission work and will pay all of her own expenses during the five years she expects to devote consecutively to the foreign field. After learning the Chinese language she will take up her duties among the women of high caste, and devote her efforts to religious and educational work. While there are so many that are trying to stir up class hatred by pointing to the extravagance and selfishness of the rich it is well to mark the humility, unselfishness, and devotion to Christ illustrated in the consecration of this young lady of wealth to the foreign missionary cause.

Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? . . . Here am I, send me. (Isa. 6: 8.)

The Deadly House Fly

Dr. E. P. Felt, the State Entomologist for New York, has just issued the following warning to the public:

Dwellings with hundreds of house flies are hardly sanitary, while buildings devoted to traffic in comestibles and swarming with flies, are not only unsanitary but a menace to public health. Recent studies have shown a close parallel in large cities between the abundance of flies and the frightful mortality among infants during the heated term. The deadly typhoid fever will soon demand its heavy annual tribute in both life and strength. The common, apparently harmless house fly is known as a carrier of intestinal germs so deadly to both infants and adults, yet its baneful potentialities are ignored for the most part.

Nothing but criminal indifference or inexcusable ignorance is responsible for the swarms of flies so prevalent in many public places. A general insistence on the part of purchasers that all foods and drinks be kept free from danger of infection of this insect, would soon render unprofitable the stores and other places of traffic where the house fly is allowed to swarm unchecked.

Scientists have contended that the house fly was a great blessing to humanity, that as a scavenger it removed decayed substances that would cause disease and death. It is likely that there is enough truth in this theory of Dr. Felt to justify great caution upon the part of the people in their homes and places of employment and compel the systematic extermination of the house fly, which has been counted heretofore simply an annoyance with a benevolent intention, but has proven to be a most deadly murderer. Disease has a way of creeping into the system in a most clandestine manner and by the minutest process, on the wings of a breath, or by the little insect so small that the naked eye can not discover it. But medical science has made such advancement that it searches for and seeks these infinitesimal enemies and destroys them.

Thou shalt not be afraid for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. (Isa. 34: 14.)

THE TRIALS OF A LITTLE MOTHER

NOT by any stretch of the imagination could Lena have been called pretty. She was undersized, even for her age (nine years), her hair was straight and lanky, her eyes peered out from a brow already showing lines of care, while her whole attitude seemed to be one of despairing resignation.

This was not to be wondered at when one realized that wherever she went two little sisters were continually dragging at her skirts, often pulling in opposite directions, as their anything but sweet wills led them. They were spoiled children, these two little girls of three and four years, and as trouble-makers for their sister they were phenomenally successful. They were as pretty as pictures, with bright black eyes, curly hair, and dimpled faces, but such tempers never before were seen at the Children's Home. Finally, after every effort of teacher and care-taker had been expended in vain, when even the persuasions of the matron were vain, Lena begged to be sent home. "I have no peace; they kick me and pull my hair, and tear my dress." "But if you go home will they be any better?" was asked. "No—but they make it so bad here, crying. I was here last summer alone and I had such a good time I thought I would bring them, but, teacher, I had better take them home, for they sure are bad." At this a howl went up from two little throats and two faces were buried in the folds of Lena's dress, and two little feet beat a tattoo against poor Lena's shins. Comfort of every imaginable description was offered, but of no avail. Dolls, picture-books, cakes, had no charms, and finally the poor little mother's prayer was granted, and she departed from beautiful Mont-Lawn, sad of face, but patient as ever, while the rascally little sisters were in high glee at the prospect of a ride behind the "pitty horses."

A few days afterward the following letter was received by the matron. It was written in pencil, and muddy with erasures and re-writing:

DEAR TEACHER every one is teacher at Mont-Lawn. I rite these few lines to let you no that I am well and hope to her same from you. Dere teacher, I like to come to Nyack again, and when I come I will not bring my little sisters. I am Lena. I hope I could stay to Nyack all summy to the country. I am home for my sisters because they were bad, and was crying, and know I like. I want to come back, because it is better than N. York air is not could for me, the country air is much beater. I am the girl that has ten children and I would like to come to the country, for that is nicer, and I will come alone if you will let me come. Please tell me in the letter if you will let me come or not, please tell me, I no you wont say no to me, because it was not me that was crying, it was my two little sisters crying, please

The Children's Chaplain

OUR beautiful Fresh Air Home at Mont-Lawn has the only "Children's Temple" in the world. It has now a regular Chaplain, the Rev. Stephen Merritt, whose appointment was announced in last week's issue. Mr. Merritt is already well-known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. His long career in the Christian ministry and his many works of benevolence have won him the love and respect of multitudes all over the land. His ministry to the children at Mont-Lawn is most helpful and inspiring, his addresses being full of the brightest anecdotes and the sunniest philosophy, while the lessons in Christian conduct which they inculcate will never be forgotten.

Let me no if you have receive my pictures I send to you. Good By, Good By, 100, kiss for your and 100 kiss for Mr. Dr. Klopsch to what I wish is to come back with you again, please ans. me quick. LENA

The next mail carried assurance to the writer of the above that she could come back and finish her time at the Home. Could any one resist such appeal? Surely not when the plain, pale face of such a little mother as Lena pleads.

A Letter from Tony's Brother

Another letter received recently by one of the teachers at Mont-Lawn is in an entirely different strain. It was from a boy, whose ten days' outing was enjoyed to the utmost:

I hope the vacant place in the dormitory is big enough so that it will make you cry, it will make me cry in a few minutes. I saw Carmen on street the other day, he saw my straw hat you gave me, and he said have got the hat from Nyack yet. I said, sure, this hat makes me remember good times I had at Mont-Lawn. Tony is thinking of the vacant place that will be in your dormitory to-night since he has left, he hopes you will get sick from it, he is very lonesome—Tony and I are always think about that vacant place, it is a very sad thing to think of. Please write to quickly as you do not know what a tempting power we have to cry loud any minute. Tell all the teachers it is a pleasure to mention them anybody. Tony has a sore hand from everybody pulling it when he is shaking hands with them good bye, and he has a sore lip from kissing mother. As I have no more to say I will close my letter with best regards hoping the "vacant place" is not growing larger.

This was written by a little Italian lad of twelve who mourned the fact that next year he would be too old to come to the Home.

Day after day and week after week the children come and go, the visit is all too fleeting, but only our Father knows how far-reaching and lasting are the influences at work during the all-too-brief stay at this beautiful holiday Home. M. S. H.

IN GOD'S GARDEN*

By THEODOSIA GARRISON

SOMEWHERE I read that little children are The flowers of the Lord. And so to-day I looked upon those little waifs of yours, Frail, city buds for any foot to mar, That you have gathered from the crowded way To bloom a little while like happier flowers. I hold you as that gardener of the Lord Who from the tended gardens beautiful Turns to those buds neglected and athirst, And makes them his to nourish and to ward Until they stand new-born and wonderful Beneath the kindly care that sought them first. And when the Master of the Garden sees, I think he will be happiest of these.

PROMINENT PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

DON DOMINGO DE OBALDIA was on July 12 elected President of Panama. The preliminary contest before the votes were cast was quite exciting and there seemed a probability that Panama might follow the example of some other Southern republics and have a revolution before the parties would come to a peaceful settlement. The people of Panama, however, seemed to have come to the conclusion that the prosperity of the country would suffer if any other than peaceful councils prevailed, so the marines sent to the Zone by the United States government fortunately had little to do. It is expected that all parties will acquiesce in the decision of the voters. Señor Obaldia is a man of culture and has represented his country as minister at Washington, where he made a most favorable impression both on officials and those who came in contact with him in a social way. It is expected that his country will be prosperous under his administration. Madame de Obaldia is a lady of fine social accomplishments and is at present in the United States.

Aeronaut Henri Farman

HENRI FARMAN, who has become famous as an aeroplane navigator, has recently come to this country, the guest of the Aero Club of America, which is trying to solve the problem of the practical navigation of the air. His first ascensions with his odd-looking aeroplane were made at Brighton Beach, Long Island. Farman looks French. His father, however, was Scotch, but the aeronaut has lived forty years in France.

The flying machine used has no gas bag or balloon, and depends on its planes to support it in the air. He has studied the flight of birds, and believes that the flying machine of the future will dispense with the balloon altogether. The aeroplane is driven by a powerful motor. The machine weighs a ton and a half and usually skims along about fifteen feet from the ground. Last January he received the Deutsch-Archdeacon prize for making a circular flight in Paris of nearly three-quarters of a mile. In July he remained in the air twenty minutes and nineteen seconds, going eleven miles in that time.

THE KEY TO THE BASTILE

IN A RECENT issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I note a message about the key to the Bastille which hangs in the reception room at Mount Vernon. It recalls a pleasing incident which occurred some years ago, when I was standing in that room beside a young man, whose artistic abilities gave promise for his future, if the liquor habit did not prove his master. We were speaking of the Bastille and its terrible history. I told him that I had a fac-simile key to the gate of the Bastille, purchased at the Paris exposition in 1889. Just then a gentleman, evidently French, came up and first showed evident amazement at seeing the key, then stormingly indignant that it should be in the United States. The conversation following led up to the opportunity to speak of the Bastille of intemperance and the key to liberty. The young man, with note-book in hand, had made a very happy sketch of the Frenchman as he had appeared; adding his own name, he tore the leaf out and offered it to me as a souvenir of the day, which I now possess.

As I received it with thanks, I took from my note-book a pledge card, at the top the words which I have carried many years: "I the Lord God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee: Fear not, I will help thee." His face flushed as he turned to me.

"You are a brave woman to offer that to a stranger." Then, his eye dropping to my white ribbon, "Oh, that explains it."

I had met him seemingly by accident, but it was a blessed opportunity which made the next hour a memorable one. "I will think of it," he said, "it's like a message from my dead mother."

Not long afterwards the card came back to me signed, and I afterwards had proof that the young artist was made free in Christ Jesus.

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

By Way of Caution

DURING the summer and early autumn a great many conferences and conventions summon people from their homes. These outings are decidedly agreeable, and in some sort satisfy those who never feel quite sure that they are right in spending money merely for recreation. Thousands of us are very much like the famous Mrs. Gilpin of whom the poet said:

That though on pleasure she was bent,
She had a frugal mind.

We like to combine instruction, mental stimulus and spiritual profit with a portion, at least, of our annual holiday making. This is wholly right, as those who return from a Chautauqua season or a delightful period of refreshment at Northfield or Silver Bay or Winona Lake can testify. But by way of caution, bits of advice are in order. One is, never attempt to carry out in one's own person attendance upon an entire programme. This is just as valuable counsel for young people as for older ones. To attend every session, to listen to every speaker, to take notes of every lecture, to do everything that is impressed upon one by eloquent orators on the platform is not only impossible, but savors of unwisdom and dissipation. The first step to take after arrival at a conference and settling upon one's quarters is to decide upon what would be better omitted and what carefully selected for the next week or fortnight. Having decided upon a course it is well to stick to it, and not to yield too easily to the persuasions of friends or the over-enthusiasm of the majority.

Time devoted to outdoor exercise, agreeable social intercourse and reasonable amusement at a summer or autumn conference is put to a use as laudable as time consecrated to business and serious occupation.

Another bit of advice is, be on the lookout to meet and make new friends. We should never forego the opportunity of making additions to the list of those who may be pleasant companions for a season, or who may later develop into dear friends. Some of us look back with constant thankfulness to God for this increase in our wealth of friendship, to summer days at Asheville, Northfield, or Chautauqua, at Ocean Grove or Martha's Vineyard. What good times we have had in meeting people like-minded with ourselves, and how our hearts have burned, kindling into new gladness and flaming into new desire, as we have clasped the hands and looked into the faces of those who have hitherto been known to us only by name! Every summer conference should be hailed as an opportunity for making additions to our list of friends. A third and frequently overlooked hint concerns the thoughtlessness of individuals about the comfort and convenience of the public in general. Every person in the secret of those who have the department of management as their province, has heard mournful tales of injury done to rooms and furniture, to plumbing and sanitary arrangements, by the heedlessness of those who do not respect property rights and who take no care of the quarters temporarily at their disposal. In the matter of ordering food in a boarding house or hotel many people are wasteful through want of thought, ordering what they do not need, and entailing upon those who provide for them a needless amount of trouble and embarrassment. The waiters at summer conferences and conventions are largely drawn from the ranks of self-supporting young people whose aim is to add something to the fund that will help them on in their education during the rest of the year. Those who treat these or any other persons who serve them with rudeness or inconsideration are culpable. The endeavor should be so to arrange one's schedule that the minimum of

A Bachelor's Dilemma

A FEW weeks ago one of the daily papers in New York published a letter from a youthful bachelor who was much embarrassed by the attentions he received from several married women living in the boarding house with himself. The husbands of these ladies were, it seemed, traveling men, and while they were on the road the wives felt at liberty to ask this detached young man to act as their escort at various functions, claiming from him the attentions that might have been paid by a brother or cousin. The man did not intimate that there was any impropriety in the conduct of the ladies, but it placed him in a dilemma. He had not the least desire to be monopolized by married women, to pay them attentions of any sort or to be at expense in going about with them. This last item might be alarming to a young fellow working on a small salary, for car fares have a way of counting up, and there are only one hundred cents in a dollar. Added to this, the bachelor had uses for his evenings, and if he had spare time there were pretty girls who were much nicer friends for him and much more congenial than married ladies who were distinctly annoying and obtrusive. To do them justice, they may not have meant to persecute the man in question, but his only relief seemed to lie in changing his boarding house.

We can hardly help the comment that as a rule a wife whose husband is absent should not be seen in public places or attend functions with any man who is not her kinsman. The conduct of the wife who accepts the escort of a man not her husband may be irreproachable, but she, nevertheless, may be unkindly criticised or become the object of gossip. Another count in the indictment is that unmarried girls have a right to the company and attention of unmarried men, while a third inference is that the life of a boarding house is unwholesome and is inimical to married happiness. In a home, let it be ever so simple, there is always plenty to do. There are rooms to set in order, meals to prepare, and the details and routine of daily living give a wife healthful occupation for body and mind whether her husband is at home or abroad. In a boarding house most women find themselves with a good deal of leisure, and the old distich is verified that "Satan finds some mischief still for idle hands to do."

On the part of the embarrassed bachelor, a little firmness is needed; but the best thing he can do is to fall in love with the right girl, propose to her, persuade her to become his wife and go to housekeeping; not try to set up a home in a boarding house.

Supply and Demand

One reason why capable women who would greatly relieve over-burdened housekeepers could they find places of service are so often disappointed in their search, is that few people want their paid helpers admitted into the privacy of the home. Rather than engage a gentlewoman who would bring ability to bear on the situation, most matrons prefer to take the raw material of untrained peasantry from abroad simply because it can be kept upon a lower plane. As yet supply and demand in this particular line have not been comfortably brought together.

WOMEN WORKERS OF NEPAL, INDIA

IN the mountain regions of Nepal the women still weave cotton cloth at the primitive hand-loom that has been used for generations. It is interesting to learn, in view of this fact, that the people of the region are beginning to import cotton cloth from Europe and America, finding it cheaper than that made at home. Changes are coming, even to the changeless East.

personal service may be required, and that every one concerned can have a fair share in the good times.

If there happen to be in the company any one who is lonely, homesick or shy, it is worth while for those who have plenty of friends and are familiar with the usages of the place to set these timid ones at ease. This is one simple way of offering the cup of cold water which has received the promise of the Master's blessing.

THE BIBLE'S WARNING ARROWS*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AMONG the most beautiful things in history are such friendships as those of Ruth and Naomi, Jonathan and David, Elijah and Elisha, Paul and Luke, Damon and Pythias. None of these is more entrancing than the friendship of Jonathan, the king's son, for the shepherd David, who was to take his crown.

Jonathan's love for David was born of admiration and gratitude for his courageous deliverance of Israel. The king's son became the ardent friend of the lowly shepherd lad immediately after his victory over Goliath. The sling that laid the Philistine low was at that moment knitting the soul of Jonathan to that of David. While it was David's harp that wrought a benignant spell on the envy-crazed Saul, David's sling worked a more permanent spell upon Jonathan. Admiration is often the portal of love, and in Jonathan's case love deepened as he saw more of David's dauntless courage in other battles for his country's defense. No jealousy stirred his heart when the women sang of his shepherd friend as above his father. "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands." A prince of smaller soul and larger selfishness would have heard in the song only the omen of a lost crown, but Jonathan was great-souled enough to rejoice in splendid achievement for his country, regardless of any loss it might bring to him. Other qualities of modest obedience to the king, and wisdom in all his ways (I. Sam. 18: 5) confirmed Jonathan's esteem and affection. Gratitude for national deliverance deepened his affection into a passion. Jonathan "loved David as his own soul," and so made with him a covenant of endless friendship. They became "blood brothers." They had each other's blood in their veins, not by heredity, but by infusion. Three days before the story of the lesson, in accordance with the custom of the country, they made a blood covenant, a part of the ceremony of which was the opening of a vein in the arm of each, by which, pressing the open veins together, their life blood crossed. Even then Jonathan knew that God had selected David instead of himself to succeed his father. But they made in blood a covenant of unflinching friendship, which Jonathan kept at the risk of his life, and which David faithfully kept with Jonathan's children's children. Like morning in contrast to midnight is the difference between the envy of Saul and the friendship of Jonathan, though the latter had as much reason for envy, if there were ever any reason for it, as his father.

This covenant of love was sealed by gifts. "And Jonathan stripped him of the robe that was upon him and gave it to David, and his garments even to his sword and to his bow and to his girdle" (I. Sam. 18: 4). To wear the royal apparel was the highest reward that could be given to "the man whom the king delighteth to honor" (Esther 6: 7-11). Mordecai had this honor because he had saved the king's life, David because he had saved not the king alone but the whole country.

How Jonathan Was Like Christ

Here it is fitting to note that Jonathan, if not a "type of Christ," was at least in several points in his life an illustration of Christ, the Son of the King of kings, who loves even the lowliest with a love stronger than death. He, too, is our "blood brother," who infuses his blood, his very life, into us, for it is not imitation of Christ but impartation of Christ that we need. And what gifts the King's son bestows on us! His robe of righteousness, his girdle of strength, his bow of victory. Jonathan's covenant brought sympathy in adversity. As when Saul conspired against David, Jonathan "went to David in the wood and strengthened his hand in God" (I. Sam. 23: 16). So when Satan plots against us the King's Son comes to us with the words of promise, "But I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not."

Love's Supreme Test

But the friendship of Jonathan reached its climax in giving to David faithful warnings of danger. It had been prearranged between these two friends that if Saul could not be dissuaded from his purpose to kill David, he should be warned, while he hid behind the stone Ezel, by arrows shot near his hiding place, beyond the lad who ran for them as the sign of alarm—or, if the danger was past, they were to fall short. The arrows went beyond, meaning, "Make speed, haste,

School teacher can show, especially to a class of youth facing many alluring temptations and feeling that "hell is abolished" because there has been some controversy whether future punishment should be "age-long" or "everlasting," is in pointing out the arrows of God's warnings in nature, Scripture and history. When the writer conducted a written examination of those over twelve years of age in twelve Sunday Schools of representative churches, we found very few who could write even one text warning men against future punishment. Twice as many could recall passages about heaven.

Not only in the Old and New Testaments, whose warning arrows we shall point out in the next lesson, but also in the oldest testament of nature and the newest testament of experience, we find God's arrows of warning.

How shallow is the saying, "I will not be frightened into being a Chris-are right and good." Rather, the Bible teaches, "by thy deeds shalt thou be justified, and by thy deeds shalt thou be condemned." There is also the ego sin of not doing: "Ye knew your duty and ye did it not." So far as belief a subject of blame it is not unconscious unbelief but wilful disbelief that Bible condemns. The wicked heart often prevents the willing brain. I wish is father to the thought. I young man who finds his mother Bible interferes with his wicked habit persuades himself to disbelieve it. is only self-made disbelief that ground of judgment, or that which some way is due to a man's neglect other fault.

The Awful Gift of Free Choice

Another warning arrow is the fact of free will. Whatever shadowy argument for second probation there may be in case of those who seem to have had no chance to choose God here, the matter certainly does not concern those to whose free will the waiting Christ at the heart's door is even now saying: "If any man will open the door I will come in."

With such a multitude of warning arrows shot across our path from God's oldest testament of nature, science, and from the newest testament of present experience, "how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?" There is nothing in nature or Scripture to warrant any one in believing that penalty will not follow sin save as repentance brings Christ to the rescue.

Rev. E. T. Bromfield, D.D.

THE Rev. Edward Thomas Bromfield, D.D., who died on Monday, July 27 at his home in Flatbush, N. Y., was born in Coventry, England, August 31, 1833. He was the son of Rev. Edward Bromfield, pastor of the Congregational Church, Elstead, Surrey, England. He received his education at New College, London, and after entering the ministry was for several years pastor of the Finsbury Park Congregational Church in the English capital. In 1867 he left England for Toronto, Canada, and removed to New York in 1871. He soon received a call as pastor to the Presbyterian Church at Noroton, Conn.; but Dr. Bromfield felt that his real life work was to be literary. About this time he was a frequent contributor to religious and secular publications, and was also active in the lecture field. While in London, before his ministerial duties began, he had done service on the parliamentary reporting staff of one of the London dailies, besides doing general literary work on various periodicals. He was brought into personal relations with Gladstone and other statesmen, and in after years much of the valuable material of those early experiences found a place in his lectures. In addition to his preaching and lecturing work in the United States, Dr. Bromfield was at one time literary editor of the North American Review. He was also the author of a Biographical Sketch and Synopses of the Plays of Shakespeare, which was published both here and in Great Britain. For a period of ten years, Dr. Bromfield was one of the Secretaries of the Presbyterian Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, with headquarters in Philadelphia.

He was twice married, his first wife and the mother of his large family being Georgianna Musgrave of London, who died in Glenbrook, Conn., in 1881. In 1890 he married Antoinette Erhardt of New York. His second wife died in 1901. Rev. Dr. Bromfield is survived by three sisters, viz., Mrs. John Woods of California, Mrs. John Plowman of Nebraska and Mrs. Charles Tod of London, England. He also leaves six sons and five daughters, one of his sons being Mr. P. B. Bromfield, manager of the Advertising Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

tarry not." David, thus warned by his friend, the king's son, escaped.

Here is the supreme point of the analogy between Jonathan and Christ. In nothing does Christ more deeply prove his love for us than in the arrows of warning that abound in the Bible, and especially in the Gospel of Matthew, on whose margin arrows are thicker than anywhere else in the writer's Bible, in which arrows are put beside every warning of judgment as reminders that every prophecy of hell, however sharp its words, is an arrow of warning, shot as lovingly by our Friend, the King's Son, as the arrows Jonathan shot to save David from threatening peril. The sharpest arrows in the Bible are from the tenderest heart that ever throbbed on earth, in the 23d and 25th chapters of Matthew, in which are the seven-times uttered "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites," and "These shall go into everlasting punishment."

The greatest kindness a Sunday

tian." Suppose David had said to Jonathan, "I will not be frightened into fleeing for safety?" "The wise man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, but the foolish pass on and are punished." It is weak to act upon groundless and imaginary fears, but it is always the mark of wisdom to shun real dangers when duty does not call us to face them. Fear is the mind's sentinel, and only the foolhardy disregard his warnings.

Another error, which would prove nothing if true, is "that the Bible dooms the greater part of mankind to hell." This certainly can not be proved. If only those who wilfully and persistently reject "the light that lighteth every man" are condemned, then the two-thirds of the race that die in childhood and many more are in the heavenly host that "no man can number."

Another error to be brushed aside is that "a man is damned because of a wrong but honest intellectual belief even when his character and conduct

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Getting Right With God*

IN THIS lesson, the theme is the spiritual and physical transformation which follows conversion. This change, while more rapid in some cases than in others, is the universal test of the reality of religion in the heart. Both in nature and in his spiritual religion, the subject undergoes a change which can not be misinterpreted. He finds it in himself, and others, too, recognize the change, which is the testimony of the new life awakened in the soul. As a coin which, through much hiding, has become so worn that the image and inscriptions are almost illegible, is sent to the mint to be re-coined and is returned bright and clean, with the inscription fully restored, so the divine image, without which no soul can pass current in heaven, is restored in man by the regenerative power of the Holy Spirit. Whatever rights man's relationship to God, rights his relationship to God's law. The demands of God's law can not be other than the demands of his holy nature. The law is not something external to God and having dominion over him. All the demands of this holy nature as it comes into contact with sin are met in the death of Christ. His death makes the sinner's pardon possible. Faith in Christ makes it actual.

Two or three years before the death of John Newton, when his sight was so dim that he was unable to read, he said: "I am not what I ought to be! Alas! how imperfect and deficient! I am not what I wish to be! I abhor that which is evil, and I would cleave to that which is good! I am not what I hope to be! Soon, soon I shall put off mortality, and with mortality all sin and imperfection! Yet, though I am not what I ought to be, nor what I wish to be, nor what I hope to be, I can truly say I am not what I once was, a slave to sin and Satan; and I can heartily join with the apostle, and acknowledge, 'By the grace of God, I am what I am!'"

"In the creation of man," wrote Bunyan, "God began at the outside; but in the work of regeneration, he first begins within, at the heart." He makes the creature a new creature, as the goldsmith melts down the vessel of dishonor and makes it a vessel of honor. This transformation extends to the whole life, and influences all our actions and feelings. Origen in his famous reply to Celsus, an early foe of Christianity, said: "Jesus came to call sinners—but to repentance. He assembled the wicked—but to convert them into new men, or rather to change them into angels. We come to him courteous, he makes us liberal; lascivious, he makes us chaste; violent, he makes us meek; impious, he makes us religious."

In the Bowery Mission, New York, the oldest rescue mission in this hemisphere, there is a motto in use which reads: "The place where God makes crooked men straight." The testimony of thousands of converts during the last fifteen years confirms the truth of this motto. These lives have indeed been transformed by the power of divine grace. Even the very faces of the men once steeped in sin and degradation have undergone a transformation. Their testimonies as to the power of the Gospel to help poor fallen humanity to "get right with God" is so amazing as to be miraculous. Free from the guilt and doom of sin, these saved and regenerated converts are led by faith and are always seeking to save others. No half-way salvation would meet their needs. They must "get right" all through.

When we put on the new man," writes Amos R. Wells, "let us throw away the old man of sin altogether." No foolish halfway following of Christ. We can not please him by living a double life—part of us his and part of the world's. Whosoever is not wholly for him is against him.

Vacation Religion*

WHEN Jesus, noting the pressure of the multitudes upon his disciples, saw that the latter did not spare themselves, but had labored to the point of weariness, he decided to give them a brief season of rest. The crowds were constantly coming and going and the apostles, we are told by Mark, "had no leisure so much as to eat." It had been a time of bitter persecution, and the Baptist's tragical death had cast a shadow of gloom over the little band; but the Kingdom was steadily growing. The Twelve had finished the reports of the results of their ministry, and Jesus, perceiving their physical weariness, had compassion on them also. He, too, must have been tired and footsore with his recent labors among the masses of people who had come from many of the cities and villages to hear the new Teacher, who proclaimed a gospel so wonderful, yet so simple and satisfying. It was wise to pause that the workers might have rest and recuperation, so the little band of personal followers, led by the Master, took boat across Lake Tiberias to a quiet neighborhood, supposed to be near Bethsaida. But even there the multitudes followed them. Whether the Master were on the seashore or the mountain, the eager seekers after the light found him and sat down to drink in his teachings.

Summer vacation is everywhere an established institution. Our people—all of them who can—leave the city for the mountains, the woods or the watering places. Some go only for a few days, others for weeks and months. With many, the vacation is a time of dissipation. Religion is left at home, church and prayer meeting are for the time forgotten and the Lord's Day is a day of gossip and concert and promenades and big dinners. If the Bible is taken along at all, it usually lies neglected in the trunk. The air seems surcharged with worldliness. Sports and pastimes that would not be thought of in the city, are indulged in. Promiscuous acquaintances are made on every hand. Sensational novels are the literature of the place. Health and comfort are recklessly sacrificed to late hours at the dance or cards. In very many cases, the vacation which was designed to build up the body results in its deterioration.

There is another class of summer sojourners, however, who make vacation time a season of real benefit and recuperation. To this class belong all who are true nature-lovers, who can spend a few weeks in the country with appreciation and contentment, and who, like the disciples of old, take their religion with them wherever they go. Such folks, with light hearts, can enjoy their holiday to the full without letting down the bars of morality or forgetting their spiritual allegiance. Their vacation religion is as sound, as sweet and as uplifting as when they are at home. They exert an influence upon all they meet; they are, like the apostles on the shores of Tiberias, teaching the truths of the Gospel, if not by preaching, at least by the beautiful example of their daily life and conversation.

We should mark a very clear line of distinction between vacation recreation and vacation dissipation. If we are satisfied to drift with the worldly current, we will soon find ourselves wholly beyond the safe, accustomed channels and in dangerous and unknown waters. Those who choose good companionships, good books, pure pleasures, and moderate excitements, and who take their religion with them, will never experience the regrets and the disappointments that are the inevitable lot of those who make surrender of principle and conduct by doing "as other people do," and who, in attempting to please the world, displease their Heavenly Father.

Beautiful Friendship

By MRS. M. BAXTER

JONATHAN, Saul's son, found in David a heart which answered to his own. Both these young men were men of God, both of them had developed a bravery and undaunted courage which had its mainspring in their trust in the living God. Both had been honored by the men of their time, and both were deservedly in favor with the people.

There was something specially lovely in Jonathan's love for David, since David was to supersede him as heir to the throne. "Jonathan and David made a covenant, because he loved him as his own soul." On Jonathan's part, it was a covenant of renouncement; he "stripped himself of the robe that was upon him (the princely robe which belonged to the king's son), and gave it to David, and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." He saw, in the man who had slain Goliath, the Lord's anointed; and no other, not even his own father, should be Jonathan's king. He is a wonderful type of a truly consecrated soul, who gives his position, name, reputation, money, all which is gain to him, and counts it loss for Christ.

It was difficult for Jonathan to believe the real truth about his father, but David had again and again had proof of Saul's murderous intentions towards him. It is a terrible thing when our eyes are opened to the delinquencies of those whom we love and look up to! Many an agonizing struggle has taken place before we have been able to believe that a father, a brother, a sister, a friend, a child, was guilty of something which was imputed to them. We learn, as we gain experience of God, and experience of life, to be no more surprised at any discovery of sin in man, and no more surprised at any depth of grace in God. David was the dearest friend Jonathan had on earth, and his life was in danger from the father whom Jonathan loved and respected.

It is at moments such as these that we take refuge in God. Jonathan was open to conviction, and he offered to do anything David should desire. David proposed to Jonathan a test by which Saul's mind towards him might be discovered. It was his duty to attend at court on the morrow, which was the feast of the new moon. He knew well that Saul was watching for an opportunity to slay him; therefore he proposed to Jonathan that he should excuse him, and give him leave to attend a family sacrifice or feast at Bethlehem. If Saul should be well satisfied, then all should be well, but if he should manifest decided signs of anger, then Jonathan should know thereby that wrath was determined upon him.

Jonathan had the mind of God even against himself; there was no rebellion in his heart against the thought that David should reign. God's choice was Jonathan's choice, although it brought him down from a prince to be a servant. There was wonderful grace in the spirit of this man, more like that of the new dispensation which he so blessedly foreshadowed; his love for David made him, in point of fact, deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow, prince though he was.

They then appointed a sign by which David, hidden away by the stone Ezel, one of the landmarks of the country, should know whether or not Saul was favorable to him. If Jonathan should say to the lad who carried his arrows, "Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee," David should know that all was well, and his apprehension had been groundless; but if he should say to the lad, "Behold, the arrows are beyond thee," then David should know that the Lord had sent him away. And once again Jonathan confirms their mutual covenant, saying: "And as touching the matter which thou and I have spoken of, behold, the Lord be between thee and me forever."

EXHAUSTION

Made Worse By Coffee Drinking

There's a delusion about coffee which many persons, not necessarily chemists only, are fast finding out.

That exhaustion from long hours of hard mental or physical work is increased by the reaction of coffee, rather than relieved, is a well known fact. A prominent music professor found the true state of the coffee evil, and also the remedy. His wife tells his experience:

"For over thirty years my husband taught music 6 days a week and 12 to 14 hours a day. None too robust, such constant work made a drain on his strength so that he was often quite exhausted by Saturday night.

"He formed the habit of drinking strong coffee regularly with his meals. Occasionally when he did not have his coffee he would suffer from headache, nervousness and weakness. This alarmed him and me also, for we feared he was becoming a slave to coffee.

"About that time we heard of Postum and decided to try it. At first we did not like it, but soon learned it should be boiled 15 minutes after boiling commences, and then when served hot with cream and a little sugar, it was a drink fit for kings.

"My husband found he was gaining in weight while using Postum. He was rid of constipation, his headache disappeared, and his nerves became strong.

"Now at 61 he is still able to work at teaching, selling instruments or superintending the farm, and can out-work many younger men.

"He has never gone back to coffee and says he never will. Recommending Postum to others is one of his hobbies. We are happy to say all our children drink Postum and are fond of it."

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

A NEW SERIAL WRITTEN FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken father at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse, Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belmont. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belmont. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill.

"LITTLE Maggie ill? Not the Maggie, the little brown-eyed girl in the pink calico dress who fell down almost in front of our auto!" said Margaret.

Nellie turned abruptly, her thin little face alight.

"My! Was that you? Did you give her the money? Say, now, ain't that queer?"

"Then it is Maggie, and she's Patty's little girl," cried Margaret. "And to think I was so near and didn't know! But tell me about her. What is the matter?"

CHAPTER XXIV

DOWN in the shabby little cottage on the hill road Mrs. Durgin walked the floor, vibrating between the window and the low bed in the corner. By the stove sat Mrs. Magoon mending a pair of trousers—and talking. To those who knew Mrs. Magoon, it was never necessary to add that last—if Mrs. Magoon was there, so also was the talking.

"It don't do no good ter watch the pot—'twon't b'ile no quicker," she was saying now, her eyes on the woman who was anxiously scanning the road from the window.

"Yes, I know," murmured Mrs. Durgin, resolutely turning her back on the window, and going over to the bed. Sixty seconds later, however, she was again in her old position at the window, craning her neck to look far up the road.

"How's Maggie doin' now?" asked Mrs. Magoon.

"She's asleep."

"Well, she better be awake," retorted Mrs. Magoon, "so's ter keep her ma out o' mischief. Come, come, Mis' Durgin, why don't ye settle down an' do somethin'? Jest call it she ain't a-comin', then 'twill be all the more happyfyn' surprise if she does."

"But she is a-comin'."

"How do ye know she is?"

"'Cause she's Maggie Kendall, an' she was Mag of the Alley; an' Mag of the Alley don't go back on her friends."

"But she's rich now."

"I know she is, an' you don't think rich folks is any good; but I do, an' thar's the difference. Mr. McGinnis has seen her, an' he says she's jest as nice as ever."

"Mebbe she is nice ter folks o' her sort, but even Mr. McGinnis don't know that you've sent fur her ter come 'way off down here."

"I know it, but—Mis' Magoon, she's come!" broke off Mrs. Durgin, and something in her face and voice made the woman over by the stove drop her work and run to the window.

Drawn up before the broken-hinged, half-open gate, were the Spencers' famous span of thoroughbreds, prancing, arching their handsome necks, and apparently giving the mighty personage on the driver's seat all that he wanted to do to hold them. Behind, in the luxurious carriage, sat a ragged little girl and what to Patty Durgin was a wonderful vision in golden brown.

Mrs. Durgin was thoroughly frightened. She, she had summoned this glorious creature to come to her because, indeed, her little girl, Maggie, was sick! And where, in the vision before her, was there a trace of Mag of the Alley? Just what she had expected to see, Mrs. Durgin did not know—but certainly not this; and she fairly shook in her shoes as the visible evidence of her audacity, in the shape of the vision in golden brown, walked up the little path from the gate.

It was Mrs. Magoon who had to go to the door.

The young woman on the doorstep started eagerly forward, but fell back with a murmured, "Oh, you can't be—Patty."

Over by the window the tall, black-eyed woman stirred then, as if by sheer force of will.

"No, no, it's me that's Patty," she began hurriedly. "An' I hadn't oughter sent fur ye, but—" her words were silenced by a pair of brown-clad arms that were flung about her neck.

"Patty—it is Patty!" cried an eager voice, and Mrs. Durgin found herself looking into the well-remembered blue eyes of the old-time Mag of the Alley.

Later, when Mrs. Magoon had taken herself and her amazed ejaculations, together with her round-eyed daughter, home—which was, after all merely the other side of the shabby little house—Patty and Margaret sat down to talk. In the bed in the corner little Maggie still slept, and they lowered their voices that they might not awake her.

"Now tell me everything," commanded Margaret. "I want to know everything that's happened."

Patty shook her head.

"Thar ain't much, an' what thar is ain't interestin'," she said. "We jest lived, an' we're livin' now. Nothin' much happens."

"But you married."

Patty flushed. Her eyes fell.

"Yes."

"And your husband—he's living?"

"Yes."

Margaret hesitated. This was plainly an unpleasant subject, yet if she were to give any help that was help—

Patty saw the hesitation and divined its cause.

"You—you better leave Sam out," she said miserably. "He has ter be left out o' most things. Sam—drinks."

"Oh, but we aren't going to leave Sam out," retorted Margaret, brightly; and at the cheery tone Patty raised her head.

"He didn't used ter be left out, once—when I married him eight years ago," she declared. "We worked in the mills—both of us, an' done well."

"Here?"

Patty turned her head away. All the animation fled from her face and left it gray and pinched.

"No. We hain't been here but two years. We jest kind of drifted here from the last place. We don't never stay long—in one place."

"And the twins—where are they?"

A spasm of pain tightened Patty's lips.

"I don't know," she said.

"You—don't—know!"

"No. They lived with us at first, an' worked in the mill. Arabella couldn't do much; you know she was—lame. After Sam got—worse, he didn't like ter have 'em 'round 'an' 'course they found it out. One night he—struck Arabella, an' 'course that settled things. Clara-bella couldn't let her stay thar another minute, an' I wouldn't, neither. Just think—an' her lame, an' we always treatin' her so gentle! I give 'em what little money I had, an' they left 'fore mornin'. I couldn't go. My little Maggie wa'n't but three days old."

"But you heard from them—you knew where they went?"

"Yes, once or twice. They started fur New York, an' got thar all right. We was down in Jersey then, an' 'twan't fur. They found the Whalens an' went back ter them. After that I didn't hear. You know the twins wa'n't much fur writin', an'—well, we left whar we was, anyhow. I've wrote twice, but thar hain't nothin' come of it. . . . But I hadn't oughter run on so," she broke off suddenly. "You was so good ter come. Mis' Magoon said you—you wouldn't want to."

"Want to? Of course I wanted to!"

"I know; but it had been so long, an' we hadn't never heard from you since you got the Whalens their new—that is—" she stopped, a painful red dyeing her cheeks.

"Yes, I know," said Margaret gently.

"You thought we had forgotten you, and no wonder. But you know now? Bobby—told you that—" Her voice broke, and she did not finish her sentence.

Patty nodded, her eyes averted. She could not speak.

ALMOST A SHADOW

Gained 20 lbs. on Grape-Nuts

There's a wonderful difference between food which merely tastes good and one which builds up strength and good healthy flesh.

It makes no difference how much we unless we can digest it. It is not really food to the system until it is absorbed. A Yo state woman says:

"I had been a sufferer for ten years with stomach and liver trouble, and had got bad that the least bit of food such as I knew, would give me untold misery for hours after eating."

"I lost flesh until I was almost a shadow of my original self and my friends were quite alarmed about me."

"First I dropped coffee and used Postum then began to use Grape-Nuts, although had little faith it would do me any good."

"But I continued to use the food and have gained twenty pounds in weight and feel like another person in every way. I feel as if I had truly begun anew for me."

"I can eat anything I like now in moderation, suffer no ill effects, be on my feet from morning until night. Whereas a year ago they had to send me away from home to rest while others cleaned house for me, I spring I have been able to do it myself alone."

"My breakfast is simply Grape-Nuts with cream and a cup of Postum, with sometimes an egg and a piece of toast, but general only Grape-Nuts and Postum. And I can work until noon and not feel as tired as of old. My work would have made me a year ago."

"There's a Reason."

Those years—afterward, were never very clear to me," went on Margaret, unsteadily. "It was all so terrible—so lonely. I know I begged to go back—to the Alley; and I talked of it and the others constantly. But they kept everything from me. They never spoke of those years in New York, and they surrounded me with all sorts of beautiful and interesting things, and did everything in the world to make me happy. In time they succeeded—in a way. But I don't think I ever quite forgot. There was always something—somewhere—behind things; yet after a while it seemed like a dream, or like a life that some one else had lived."

Margaret had almost forgotten Patty's presence. Her eyes were on the broken-hinged gate out the window, and her voice was so low as to be almost inaudible. It was a cry from little Maggie that roused her, and together with Patty she sprang toward the bed.

"My—lucky—stars!" murmured the child, a little later, in dim recollection as she gazed into the visitor's face.

"You precious baby! And it shall be 'lucky stars'—you'll see!" cried Margaret.

CHAPTER XXV

It was, indeed, "lucky stars," as little Margaret soon found out. Others found it out, too; but to some of these it was not "lucky" stars. At the dinner table on that first night after the visit to Patty's house, Margaret threw the family into no little consternation by abruptly asking: "How do you go to work to get men and things to put houses into livable shape? . . . I don't suppose I did put it very business-like," she added laughingly, in response to Frank Spencer's amazed ejaculation.

"But what—perhaps I don't quite understand," he murmured.

"No, of course you don't," replied Margaret; "and no wonder. I'll explain. You see I've found another of my friends. It's the little girl, Patty, with whom I lived three years in New York. She's down in one of the mill cottages, and it leaks and is in bad shape generally. I want to fix it up." There was a dazed silence; then Frank Spencer recovered his wits and his voice.

"By all means," he rejoined hastily. "I shall be attended to at once. Just give me your directions and I will send the men around there right away." "Thank you; then I'll meet them there and tell them just what I want done."

Frank Spencer moistened his lips, which had grown unaccountably dry. "But, my dear Margaret," he remonstrated, "surely it isn't necessary that you yourself should be subjected to such annoyance. I can attend to all that is necessary."

"Oh, but I don't mind a bit," returned Margaret, brightly. "I want to do it. It's for Patty, you know." And Frank Spencer could only fall back in his chair with an uneasy glance at his sister.

Before the week was out there seemed to be a good many things that were "for Patty, you know." There was the skilled physician summoned to prescribe for Maggie; and there was the strong, capable woman hired to care for her, and to give the worn-out mother a much needed rest. There were the large baskets of fruit and vegetables, and the boxes of beautiful flowers. In fact, there seemed to be almost nothing throughout the whole week that was not "for Patty, you know."

Even Margaret's time—that, too, was given to Patty. The golf links and the tennis court were deserted. Neither Ned nor the beautiful October weather could tempt Margaret to a single game. The music room, too, was silent, and the piano was closed.

Down in the little house on the Prospect Hill road, however, a radiant young woman was superintending the work that was fast putting the cottage into a shape that was very much "livable." Meanwhile this same radiant young woman was getting acquainted with her namesake.

"Lucky Stars," as the child insisted upon calling her, and Maggie were firm friends. Good food and proper care were fast bringing the little girl back to health; and there was nothing she so loved to do as to "play" with the beautiful young lady who had never yet failed to bring toy or game or flower for her delight.

"And how old are you now?" Margaret would laughingly ask each day, just to hear the prompt response:

"I'm 'most five goin' on six, an' I'll be twelve ter-morrer."

Margaret always chuckled over this retort and never tired of hearing it, until one day Patty sharply interfered.

"Don't—please don't! I can't bear it when you don't half know what it means."

"When I don't know what it means! Why, Patty!" exclaimed Margaret.

"Yes. It's Sam. He learned it to her."

"Well?" Margaret's eyes were still puzzled.

"He likes it. He wants her ter be twelve, ye know," explained Patty with an effort. Then, as she saw her meaning was still not clear, she added miserably: "She can work then—in the mills."

"In the mills—at twelve years old!"

Thy Will Be Done

WHENEVER in the twilight fair,
In youth's bright days, now flown afar,
I marked the first sweet evening star,
I used to breathe some darling prayer.

And, gazing at the mystic sign,
I fancied in my foolish brain
That some occult but certain chain
Would link me with that wish of mine.

But now I mark the star so white
And crush the wish I dare not say.
Instead, "Sweet Christ," I humbly pray,
"Send me whatever may be right."

"I long for that which works me ill.
I can not see thy ends so far."
And through my tears, the evening star Seems smiling, "Thou shalt have thy will."

—Kate Upson Clark.

Questions and Answers

J. S. H., York, Pa. Why, when spoken of in the parable, is the elder brother mentioned as "The First Citizen"?

It is a term of honor and affection that is applied to one who has been long in public life and who has rendered distinguished public service.

Subscriber, Deer Park, Wis. Who was represented by the elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son?

Trench and other commentators hold that the parable deals with classes or characters, and that the elder son represents "a form of legal righteousness not altogether false but low, who had been kept by the law from gross offenses." The occasion of the parable was the murmurings of the Pharisees against Christ for receiving the wicked, and it was designed to show the Saviour's peculiar love for sinners. In interpreting any of the parables, the circumstances must always be taken into account. The joy over the returned prodigal is not the portion of those whose whole lives have been spent in the service of their Father in heaven; yet instead of grudging the prodigal his welcome, they, by contrasting their own happy condition with his recent state, should rather be satisfied with the quiet confidence and appreciation of their life-long fidelity, and with the enjoyment of the Father's deep and abiding love and trust. The elder brother was clearly a type of those who are not sufficiently generous in heart to find real joy in the return of the wanderer. He was a cold-hearted Christian.

M. A. S., New York City. Why did Jesus seemingly rebuke the rich young man, when he called him "Good Master"? Why did he say "there is none good but One, that is God," when he himself is God and absolutely good?

Some notable commentators, including Tischendorf, Lachmann, Alford, DeWette, Meyer, Olshausen, etc., hold that the correct reading of this passage is: "Why askest thou me concerning what is good? One is the Good One." The weight of authority, however, supports the received text, as we have it in the Gospels. Jesus apparently intended to distinguish between the world's formal appellation of goodness, as in the phrase, "Good Master," and to point out that supreme goodness belonged to God alone, and therefore to himself. This would seem to be the favored interpretation to-day, although it is a text which has given rise to much discussion.

C. H., Springboro, O. 1. How many Marys are spoken of in the New Testament? 2. What does the word "Paradise" mean in Luke 23: 43?

1. There are several, including Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary Magdalene, Mary the sister of Lazarus, Mary the wife of Cleopas, and Mary the mother of John. 2. It means the abode to which the spirits of the redeemed are admitted on being liberated from the body. This was the meaning as expressed in the Talmudical writings and used by our Lord in its current acceptation. (See also Rev. 2: 7.)

H. J. B., Omaha. In the American Revised Version the foot-note to John 9: 38 reads: "The Greek word denotes an act of reverence, whether paid to a creature or to the Creator." Am I to infer from this that the revisors regard Christ as a creature?

Not necessarily. The explanation is merely meant to show that the same word or phrase is applied in either case. In the present instance, it was an act of worship suddenly born of faith. It was adoration paid to a Divine Being.

M. W. G., Wisconsin. 1. Where are the Ozark Mountains? 2. Has the Government decided that Niagara Falls shall be left in their natural condition? 3. Are the countries of South America all republics? 4. Are they as free in government as the United States?

1. The Ozarks run northeast and southwest through Arkansas, Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma. They range from 1,500 to 2,500 feet in height. They are rich in minerals and are heavily timbered. 2. Two companies on the American side of the falls and three on the Canadian are using the water power, and it is evident that any further commercialization of the falls will endanger the cataract. Efforts are being made to secure uniform legislative action by Ontario and New York to save the falls, but they have not yet been successful. 3. Yes, all South American countries are republics, Brazil being the last one to change to that form. 4. No. In Peru and several others the Roman Church is strongly entrenched, is the state church, and influences political action. In Peru the exercise of any other religion is forbidden. In other ways there is quite a difference from the government of the United States.

Reader, Newark, N. J. According to what form was George Washington baptized?

George Washington's parents were Episcopalians and he was baptized according to the form prescribed by that church. You can get a large life of Washington in the Newark library.

A. M. C., Wolfboro Falls, N. Y. 1. Please explain Ephesians 6: 12, and I. Corinthians 9: 27. 2. In II. Corinthians 12: 2, did Paul refer to himself? What is the third heaven?

1. They describe two phases of Christian warfare: one general, the other particular. The passage in Ephesians explains that they are more than human foes that we have to contend with. They are foes that rule the civilized as well

R. C., Lowell, Ind. What did Lazarus do after he was resurrected?

The presumption is that he was taken to his home. Tradition says he lived for nearly thirty years afterward and preached the Gospel of Jesus in various parts of the world. Of course, this cannot be asserted positively.

B. S., Kutch, Col. 1. What additions to the United States territory have been made by war, purchase, annexation? 2. What has been the progress of science and invention during the last quarter of a century?

1. War and purchase have often been combined. Louisiana was purchased from France in 1803. This included the territory of the present State and several others. Florida, part of Alabama and Mississippi were ceded by Spain in 1819. The territory of the present States of Washington, Oregon and Idaho were claimed by right of discovery herd Kings. The Bible says nothing as to the origin. Their country lay along the Mediterranean seacoast, stretching from Egypt to Phoenicia.

A. H., Otego, Kan. Is the Christian free to choose his own company and direct his own conduct?

He is a free agent, certainly, but if he be a true Christian he will order his whole life according to the teaching of Jesus, and will seek the companionship of good people. He will find a better use for his time than spending it among thoughtless and the ungodly, and for the sake of influencing others, if nothing else, he will avoid even the appearance of evil.

J. M. L., Bucyrus, O. Are we to understand Rom. 2: 12-14 as applying to the Gentiles only, or to the heathen generally?

It has a wide application. "These having no the law are a law unto themselves." Even among the heathen God has raised up his witnesses for righteousness and against iniquity, who have within their own breasts a voice which commends or condemns.

W. G. S., Beech Creek, Ky. 1. Was there a place in the wall of the city called the "needle's eye" (Matt. 19: 24)? 2. Which is supposed to be the first day of the week? 3. Which was the day of the resurrection?

1. The "needle's eye" is the small gate or wicket at the side of the big gate at the entrance to the city wall. When the big gate closes for the day, all entrance must be gained through the small gate, and to a loaded camel, or indeed to any body of considerable size, passage is impossible. 2. The Jewish Sabbath was on Saturday, and the first day of the week corresponded with our Sunday. It was very early Sunday morning (the first day of the week) that Jesus arose from the tomb.

L. A. W., Naugatuck, Conn. Who is the author of the Gospel of John, and of the Revelation?

The authenticity of the four Gospels rests upon stronger evidence than any of the other ancient writings. They were all composed during the latter half of the first century. Irenaeus, Origen and Tertullian accepted them as the work of the apostles and the disciples of the apostles. From the beginning, the Gospel of John was received in the church as the apostle's own production, although there are evidences of interpolations by another hand toward the close. It was probably written at Ephesus or Patmos. There has been much dispute concerning Revelation, but the evidence favors the claim that it was written by the apostle at Patmos, or immediately after his return from that island.

There is another tradition that the prophet, with one of the lineal descendants of David, brought the Ark of the Covenant to Ireland and hermetically sealed it up in the hill Tara."

as the uncivilized world; yet they are not rightful rulers but usurpers, who will ultimately be driven out. In the passage in I. Corinthians, Paul is speaking of the individual spiritual conflict and especially of the temptations of the flesh and how they may be overcome. The Revised Version gives the preferred rendering "rejected" instead of "castaway," Paul's intimation being that, after having called others to the contest and prepared them, he being also a contestant, might fail to win the special prize or reward of those who turn many to righteousness. This construction is borne out by the context (vs. 18-23). 2. He meant himself, as is clear from the corrected reading in R. V. ("I know a man"). The "third heaven" means the third ecstasy or degree of rapture. It is written: "The first heaven is that of the clouds; the second, that of the sky; the third is above both, where God's glory continually shines."

L. M. L., Dillon, Mont. How many missionary journeys did Paul make and where were they taken?

TWO GRAND DAMES FROM THE ORIENT

By ABBY G. BAKER

THE hot July sun blazed down upon the white asphalt paving of the Washington streets until their hard opaque surface fairly quivered the heat. Scarcely a leaf moved in the overhanging trees and their motionless branches made marvellous tracery upon the stone steps leading into the Chinese legation, as the afternoon sun slanted across them. The obsequious Buttons said that Madame Wu was at home and with Mr. Minister Wu could be down presently. He bowed repeatedly as he showed the visitor into the drawing room.

That cool, shadowy apartment was a delightful contrast to the glaring heat without. The atmosphere of the surroundings was so oriental that one could easily have fancied himself in a house in the Flowery Kingdom. Bamboo chairs and rockers predominated, and on each side of the mantel tall dragon-embellished vases almost reached the height of the projecting shelf. On a lacquered cabinet were a dozen different kinds of vases, long slender necked affairs that would hold but a single blossom, bulging pot-pourri jars with ornamental tops, as well as chrysanthemum polychrome bowls. In this and in the drawing room beyond are teakwood stands upholding large bowl-shaped vases of the old blue and white Chinese porcelain. The north drawing room is furnished entirely in elaborately wrought teakwood, and in the bay window upon a slightly raised dais are "the seats of ceremony," four handsomely carved teakwood chairs of varying sizes. Here Mr. Minister Wu receives his official visitors, the caller of most distinction occupying the largest chair. The legation property is a stately stone structure standing upon the northeast corner of Nineteenth and U Streets, and was erected by the Chinese government about five years ago.

Minister Wu always wears the picturesque native costume and that afternoon he carried an immense feather fan, with which he emphasized and punctuated his remarks. Madame Wu, who came in a moment later, is short and plump, with a bright healthful color which belies the years that make her a grandmother. Minister Wu has lately become a vegetarian, and he thinks that it will lengthen his life to two hundred years; but it has already robbed him of the ruddy skin and surplus flesh he had when he was in America a few years ago. Nothing, however, could rob him of his genial, cordial courtesy.

thought, because they did not figure publicly, they were uneducated and without influence. The truth is, the higher-class women of my country have always been more or less educated and have always wielded great influence. What woman of history has been more influential than our Empress Dowager? And she is by no means the only Chinese woman who has had part in the affairs of state. Many Chinese women," and here the Minister gave an energetic wave of the fan as though he would sweep all cobwebs from our mental skies concerning his countrywomen, "have become famous in literature, and every good Chinese housewife manages her household and often her husband's finances also. While they were not educated in the Western sense of the word, the women of the better class could not be called uneducated."

"Schools?" he repeated in answer to a query. "Aside from the schools established by the missionaries, until within recent years girls were educated by tutors at home and there were no schools such as were maintained for the boys. That is one of the greatest reforms of the country. The government has established a large boarding school for girls at Peking, and many others have been opened throughout the kingdom."

Here Madame Wu interposed to remind him that the Empress Dowager herself had given a large amount to establish the girls' school at Peking, and that our former minister's wife, Mrs. Conger, had done much toward interesting the Empress in education for women and girls. Mrs. Conger was a great favorite with the Empress Dowager and frequently talked with her on this subject. When General and Mrs. Miles were in Peking, the Empress entertained Mrs. Miles and asked her many questions about the condition and education of the American women, and as Mrs. Miles left her the Dowager Empress clasped her hands and said, "Oh, what wouldn't I have given to have been born in a land where women have so many opportunities! I hope the time is coming when my countrywomen may

A SERMON BY

THE NEW LIFE

TEXT:
"There is no new thing under the sun." — Eccles. 1: 9.
"The old things are passed away; behold, they are become new." — II. Cor. 5: 17.

ONE of the first things noted about Christ's teaching was that it differed from the current teaching of his time. Mark says the people were amazed and said, "What is this teaching?" and we are told after his sermon on the mount, the people were "astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one having authority."

Christianity is not only an attractive force, drawing men up to a distinct personality, but it is a new force inspiring men with new ideas, and putting into life a constant element of newness. It is, on account of this fact, a religion which will always be refreshing because it has in it the element of variety. Lack of this element of newness in life leads to two very grave results. First, those who find no new thing in life begin to despair. They grow weary of existence. They raise the question, is life worth living? and answer it by saying, no. More than ten thousand people in the United States commit suicide every year. These people by the very act declare their weariness of existence. It is because they are tired of the thing called life and have no more use for it. The second grave result is the restless and unsatisfying search after something new on the part of those who are looking for excitement or change in the superficial instead of the permanent source of interest. Those who are not weary of life on account of poverty or the grind of toil or hard outward conditions, those who are blessed, or cursed, with plenty of money, very often find life as tasteless and insipid as the former people, and they search after new things like the Athenians, who spent their time in nothing else except to hear or see some new thing. This leads to the senseless fads of society in its ceaseless round of searching after something with which to amuse itself. It is said by one historical writer that the real reason for Napoleon's desertion of Josephine, and the beginning of the breaking up of the French Empire, was Josephine's extravagant habits, which did not permit her to enjoy a dress or a cloak more than one or two days at a time. The same ceaseless search after new things marks the changes in the fashions. But these things are superficial. They never satisfy the real longing for the freshness of life and never will.

A Moral Universe

I. The entrance of Christ into the world brings a new definition of life, and it assumes various forms; so we say first, all things become new to the Christian because he has revealed to him, through the teaching of Christ, the real God.

A vast deal depends upon the definition a man has of God. In many respects, in most, perhaps, a man is what his God is to him. In any case he never rises above his conception of his God, the only exception being where he gets a new definition. Then his God changes. But Christ revealed the nature of God to man as follows: First, he is in charge of the universe. This gives me confidence and courage. The world is not run by politicians and it is not dependent for its ultimate redemption on newspaper editors or political conventions. Second, the God of the Christian is not only in charge of the universe; he owns it. This also gives me a splendid vision of life by inspiring me with the thought of my accountability to God first instead of to men. In the third place, the Christian's God is a jealous God. He will not permit his laws to be broken with impunity. If I wake up in the morning with the definition of God as a righteous God, one who is making laws for the good of the universe, I feel my accountability and responsibility. I find myself in a moral universe, which adds to my interest in life. In the fourth place, the God of the Christian is one who will ultimately triumph. This also adds to my interest in life, and it takes away my possible discouragement, for the future is assured. And in the fifth place, the Christian's God is one who loves every child personally, and will help every one of his children in every kind of trouble. That also dignifies life and helps to make it worth while. So all these definitions of the true God, which virtually spring from the teaching of Christ, add to the real interest of life.

II. Life becomes new in Christ because he revealed to men the value of the individual.

I am of great value to the universe. As a Christian I find that I have not valued myself highly enough. I am very much needed in the universe.

Christ said, "How much more then is a man worth than a sheep." He taught that God noted the dropping of a sparrow to the ground, and commenting upon it said, "How much more, then, are you, men, worth than these sparrows." To wake up every morning and realize the fact of one's individual worth in the sight of God inspires a feeling of self-respect and puts newness into the life's work. Mrs. Whitlock expresses this in two beautiful stanzas when she says:

O Christ, I have so little,
And that so little good,
I would bring thee gifts that are rich and great,
But I fail in the thing I would.

Then God says:

My son, I know thy longing,
And the grandeur of thy wish,
But the thing thou hast is the thing I need,
Bring me thy loaves and fish.

The old doctrine of the survival of the fittest was the doctrine of despair. Under that philosophy some of the best, bravest, and noblest souls of mankind would never have seen the light. If he had been born in the old iron days of Greece, the father of Henry Ward Beecher would have been thrown out upon the side of Mount Taygetus and left there to be devoured by the wolves, because he was so weak that his nurse thought he would not live, and only the Christian law of care for the weak and helpless preserved an exceedingly valuable life to the world. The future development of any soul is an unknown quantity, but Christ inspires men with the thought that anything is possible in a human being when once God is given full possession in it. It is this future possibility which compels the Christian to regard himself as of tremendous and unknown value, and every other person as well. One of the reasons for Governor Hughes' action in demanding that New York put an end to race track gambling was the large number of letters he received from fathers and mothers, pleading for their sons who had been ruined by this gambling habit. It was because the governor of the State realized the awful value of the human beings whose moral character was being destroyed that he took such vigorous action in the matter. The early church was kept alive and grew tremendously because it had a vision of the value of life.

III. The new life in Christ is a reality because it puts value upon others' lives.

A new world has been opened up by altruism. The pagan world revolved around itself. It had no vision of missions. Weariness from the world-routine is inseparable from the self-centred life. The best way to escape from despair and weariness is to help some one else. Jesus told his disciples to go and make disciples. A large secret in the happiness of any one is always found at the point where the soul begins to cease making introspection and forgets itself in care of others. Those who have been overwhelmed with grief and trouble in every age of the world have tried this recipe, and, without exception, have found themselves back in the way of happiness again.

The Brotherhood of Man

IV. Life is made new in Christ by a wider horizon.

The entire world is taken into one's own individual world. There is an enlargement of the thought of existence which of necessity adds to the interest in daily life. Suppose a man had been blind and deaf and dumb for fifty years; then by a miracle suppose he recovers all these faculties fully. Some one gives him a microscope. He looks through it and sees a world he has never seen before. Some one gives him a telescope. He looks through it and sees an entirely new universe. Some one gives him a phonograph. He hears something entirely new. He listens to a pipe organ. He sees a steam engine at work. He is given a trip on an ocean steamer. He sees a modern printing press. An entire universe is opened up to him, and he enlarges his interest in life, which was once centred about the one sense of touch or smell or taste. There is a vast difference between his interest in life now and that of fifty years ago. In the same manner Christ brings into life the element of world interest by revealing to men along different lines great world interests. A man begins to feel that he is a native and citizen of the world. All men become his brothers. His own country is not bounded by his own president or king or parliament, but he has a vital and living interest in every other people and government in the world. It is at this point that we have constant quarrel with the daily press. It gives information to the Christian reading public concerning the great and wonderful progress of kingdom of God in other countries. The average congregation in the most intelligent parish receives very little about the work of its own mission societies. It gets practically no information whatever from the daily paper, which is the one source of information on other subjects with which the average man is familiar. It is no wonder we have little interest in the work of the kingdom of God when we know so little about it. A national convention which nominates a president is a great affair and the average man reads pages of newspaper accounts of it. He is interested because he knows something already about the men and measures at the movement of the party. But the kingdom of God in its conquest is greater than any national convention or politics, but the average man is not interested, in the first place, because he is absolutely ignorant concerning this movement. How many men in our churches know the following facts about Protestant missions? There are at present 33,581 mission stations around the world; 15,178 white men and women at work in them; 92,442 native preachers and teachers; 1,598,644 church members in foreign countries; 137,714 were added to these churches last year; 1,272,283 pupils are in schools of learning, and to keep this work going every year $21,418,816 are contributed. These facts added to the fact of one's own church membership give one a sense of world power, and it is necessary to know the facts in order to get this world vision. Having this vision adds to the interest in life because it makes one feel his touch with the universe and with the kingdom of God, which is not bounded by any political party, by any nation, or by any form of government. This keeps one from getting narrow and helps to magnify directly his own Christian life.

Life Made New

V. Life is made new for the Christian by the vision of the possibility of a change in human affairs.

All progress is dependent upon this factor. We do not regard the Bible as we once did. We view it and study it in an entirely different manner. The coming of Christ into the world has meant the emancipation of thought. We are not bounded by traditions. We are not bound to believe the things our fathers believed. Our definition of the church is vastly different from what it used to be. The functions of the minister and of the church as an organization are in many particulars essentially different from what they were fifty years ago. Neither does the Christian say that there is no change possible in evil conditions. We look at a strongly entrenched evil and say it is not possible to change it, but the spirit of Christ says it can be changed. Because North Topeka has had two floods within the last five years, must it necessarily always have floods? We say, No. We say that, by the exercise of proper engineering skill and the outlay of money these floods can be averted. Shall we say of any evil in the community, like the saloon or the gambling hall or places of impurity or improper theatrical attractions or the worldly newspaper, that it has come to stay? We say, No. It is subject to change. In other words, the spirit of hopefulness concerning the future gives added zest and newness to life. In my own life I do not need to say that because I have suffered in the past I shall continue to suffer in the future. Because I have been a sinner all these years it does not mean that I must be one in the years that are left to me. Life would be a very dreary thing if there were no possibility of change in it, if we had nothing to look forward to or anticipate in the way of betterment. This vision of better things in the future came into the world with Christ.

VI. The newness of life is possible because Christianity gives to men the constant thought of the superhuman.

This is what really gave Paul and the early disciples courage. They lived in a constant atmosphere of other-worldliness. God was as real to them, Christ was as real to them, as Caesar, and more powerful. The future was as real to them as the present. They were not afraid of death, because they carried with them an unquestioning belief in the indestructible character of their spirits. Their daily life was filled with the superhuman, and so it have similar opportunities at their command. The schools for girls," Minister Wu continued interpreting, "so far have largely been opened in the treaty ports, such as Peking, Shanghai, and Canton, but undoubtedly they will extend ultimately over the entire country. Some are government institutions, but as yet the majority of them are mission schools, and too much praise can not be given the American and English missionaries for the faithful and painstaking work they have done in these schools. Many of the daughters of wealthy families have been educated in them. No, Madame Wu was not. Her father had a large family—seven daughters and eight sons—and he educated his daughters at home under tutors. My son's wife, who with her baby is here at the legation, was educated at Saint Stephen's School for Girls, a Church of England school in Hong Kong. In the mission schools for girls, and in the government schools also, the teachers are almost entirely women, although in some of the latter men are employed to teach Confucianism. Reverence for Confucius is inculcated in all the government schools."

When asked how the mothers of China regarded the movement to educate their daughters, Mrs. Wu said with much positiveness that they hailed the movement with delight. They were as anxious now to educate their daughters as their sons. This educational movement would have the effect of leading the women of their country to take their place with the women of Europe and America. "You know," said Minister Wu, "the Manchurians have always been more liberal toward the women than the Chinese proper. They have never countenanced the small feet of the Chinese women, and they have encouraged the social mingling of the sexes. Now, our own women are adopting the same methods. A number of years ago the Empress Dowager prohibited foot-binding, and in many ways the women are leading less secluded lives. Socially, it is becoming more and more popular to adopt Western customs. We are beginning to have our dinner parties, receptions, and so on, where the women appear with the men, and in all the large cities now it is a common sight to see women of the higher classes go out into the streets to return calls, or go to the shops unattended. For hundreds of years such a thing was undreamed of by women of station."

"Our women cling to many superstitions and beliefs that the men do not retain. For this reason it is harder for a Chinese woman to accept Christianity. And yet many, very many of them have done so. A faithful teacher usually means a faithful proselyte and you know there are many missionaries in China. And Christianity is an excellent thing; excellent," he added.

Madame Wu, whose father was a Congregational minister, has long been a firm believer in Christianity. She is a delightful little woman, broad-minded and public-spirited, and she is widely known in her own land for her advanced ideas and her generous philanthropy. She had her own small feet unbound several years ago, immediately after the edict to unbind the feet had been promulgated.

The Japanese ambassadorial property is down on N Street near Thirteenth, Washington, but the last two ambassadors from that country, Barons Aoki and Takahira, have occupied the Sherman marble mansion on K Street facing Franklin Park, as the ambassadorial residence. It was there that the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD went after leaving the Chinese legation.

Baron and Baroness Takahira were preparing to leave the city upon the following day, and all the furnishings were covered with the conventional cool-looking white linen.

The Baroness came smilingly into the drawing room. "It is so warm you must cool yourself," said the little lady as she sat down beside her guest and pressed into her hand an exquisite Japanese fan, which was decorated with Oriental figures and which wafted a peculiarly sweet Oriental perfume with each vibration. "My Inglis is so bad my husband will talk with us," she said as she bowed toward the Baron, who had followed her into the room.

"You know that we have a profound regard for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Japan," the Ambassador began, "for what it has done for our country in famine times, and you know also that the Emperor decorated your good Dr. Klopsch for his philanthropy. We shall be very glad to tell its readers about the educational movement among the women of our country. It was in 1874, if I remember rightly, that the government sent its first delegation of our young women abroad to study. There were five and they came to the United States. Two returned shortly afterward on account of health, but two entered Vassar College and one the Noble School, and all were graduated with class honors. When they returned to Japan, one of them became the wife of Admiral Uri, who served with distinction in our late war with China, and who was a graduate of your Naval Academy at Annapolis. Another married General Oyama, present Chief Marshal of Japan, while the third, Miss Tsuda, went back and started a school for girls in Tokyo, which has become one of the largest and most influential in the empire."

Mr. Chou Chou Wu, Son of the Chinese Minister

Here Baroness Takahira said something to the Ambassador in Japanese. "That is true," he returned in English. "The Baroness reminds me of the great influence these ladies have exerted in our country. Madame Oyama and Madame Uri hold high social positions and have done much toward creating a sentiment in favor of the education of women."

"Many other Japanese women came to America and Europe to study. The great majority came independently at their own expense—daughters of wealthy families, I mean, and no official record was kept of them; but we know there have been many. We know of many who have gone to China, India, Assam, and other Oriental countries as teachers. Just before I came to America this time, I met the wife of a high official in Japan who told me she was educated in the United States and that almost immediately upon her return she was offered a very large salary to become a teacher for the women in the home of a wealthy Chinese, several years prior to her marriage.

"Elementary education is compulsory in Japan from the sixth to the fourteenth year with both sexes. We have over thirty-two thousand elementary schools with over five million pupils, and two Imperial Universities, at Tokyo and Kyoto, with nearly six thousand students. Besides these there are higher normal schools, grade normal schools, high schools, and technical and other special schools in all our cities. There is also the Peers' School for the children, sons and daughters, of noble families, the doors of which are now open, with certain limitations, to children of the humbler classes. The year after the Japanese-Chinese war a few students from China entered the Japanese schools; now there are thousands of Chinese students in our schools, and a large number from India and Siam."

Baroness Takahira smiled a little at the emphasis the ambassador laid upon the excellence of their schools. She was asked what effect this higher education was having upon the women of Japan—if the girl who received the higher education and could be self-supporting, cared as much to marry as her sister who was not so well educated? She discussed this with a good deal of animation with her husband in Japanese. Then, speaking for both, the Baron said:

"You know that the Japanese live most simple lives, and it is a proverb of our country that a Japanese woman is always contented. Higher education has not as yet changed this greatly; but it has changed some of the conditions. For instance: formerly we followed the Oriental custom of early marriages; now a girl is still in school at the age her mother was married. Many women are teaching, and some are in other public places earning their own support. And, and—" he hesitated and Baroness Takahira almost laughed outright at his hesitation. "Well, yes," he added rather reluctantly, "I suppose it has made some difference, and the Japanese girl, like her American cousin, is a little more independent about marriage when she finds she can support herself. But it is not the policy of our government to educate them for that. There is no higher lot for woman than wife and motherhood, is there?"

The Baron paid a high tribute to the mission schools. "There is no doubt," he said cordially, "that the mission schools have done a great deal for my country. There have been, and there are, magnificent men and women who have done mission work there. Such names as Verbeck, Brown, Hepburn, Williams, Murray, and others will always be honored in my country, and many of my own countrymen who have had a large part in making New Japan are, or were, Christian men. But we do not accept the tenets of Christianity as a whole. Many of us are free thinkers. We are striving to find the best in all religions—we are striving to find the best."

Baroness Takahira, who had been absent a moment, here returned to the drawing room with a photograph of herself.

"This was taken in Japan just before we left, but as it is in native costume, you may not like it," she said a little slowly with her quaint accent. She was assured that the native costume would make it of more interest to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and as her sixteen-year-old daughter came in just then from a drive, her photograph was added. She is a pretty little Japanese maid, and this is her first visit to the United States. She goes with her parents for the remainder of the summer to Buena Vista Springs, but will enter one of our women's colleges this winter. The Ambassador and Baroness Takahira also have three sons, but they are schoolboys, and as the Baron believes it is better for them to be educated in their own country, they have remained in Japan. The Baroness herself was educated at the Higher Normal School of Tokyo and has taken a leading part in all the reform movements which affected her sex. She is a gracious, lovely woman in face, figure and character.

THE NEW LIFE

should be and is with the Christian of to-day. He may awake to his day's work and face hard, disagreeable tasks, and do the same things he did yesterday, but he is supported at every moment by the consciousness of divine presence and divine companionship. The apostles and early disciples were happy and enthusiastic people not because they had no trouble. They had more trouble than we have. They were persecuted and imprisoned, and burned at the stake and torn by wild beasts, and driven out of their homes. The zest of life for them, therefore, did not exist in the fact that they were free from trouble. Their lives were full of trouble. But they looked forward to the day's life with interest and eagerness because the divine and the superhuman were in their thoughts, and they were not afraid or downcast because of the hatred of men. They knew that eternal forces were all around them. This knowledge kept them from despair and doubt. They were able to sing the song:

Oh, I hear Hope singing,
Singing softly in an undertone,
Singing as if God had taught her,
"It is better farther on."

The newness of life therefore is a practical possibility. Christianity does not come to men with a tried set of rules and lay them down and then apply the lash and drive men to their duty, but it brings into every life those factors which really make the day's work interesting. The universe has a reason. The purpose of one's life becomes clearer. The relation of one soul to another is defined and God is made to appear what he really is, a Father of his children, working out with them a full redemption. The earthly life becomes a school of discipline for the life which is to go on forever, and life becomes worth living, not only in the present, but in the world to come. Paul again states the reason for existence as follows: "What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound? God forbid. We who died to sin, how shall we any longer live therein? Or are ye ignorant that all who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that, like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in 'newness' of life."

THE FIRE-SWEPT NORTHWEST

BRITISH COLUMBIA has just been the scene of one of the most devastating forest fires in the history of Canada. Towns and villages were licked out of existence in a few minutes by great tongues of flame, while numbers of fleeing fugitives lost their lives penned within the fiery circle; thousands of homeless people, driven from one place of refuge after another, at last sought safety in streams and in open rocky spaces on the mountain sides. The towns destroyed are Fernie, Hosmer, Sparwood, parts of Michel and one or two others. The devastated district reaches from Cranbrook in British Columbia to within a short distance of Frank in Alberta. It is a distance of fifty miles or more. Coal Creek was threatened, but the flames veered a little from the direct path and the town was saved.

The conflagration started as a small bush fire in some "wood slashings" of a lumber company across the river from the town of Fernie. A high wind was blowing; it moved rapidly to the river bank, jumped to the opposite shore and went rapidly eastward through the town. The wooden buildings seemed hardly touched with fire before the flames were shooting upward and outward from roofs and windows. It was like a tornado of flame, one building seventy feet long was picked up as if it had no weight, carried across several open spaces and dropped into the middle of the main street, scattering burning shingles and brands as it made its wild journey.

When it was seen that the entire town was threatened with destruction women and children were placed in box cars made up into special trains which were moved onward to towns supposedly out of reach of the fire. The crowds gathered at the railway stations to take the trains for Hosmer. The trains were moved as rapidly as possible by the engineers who could see the way ahead with difficulty through the dense clouds of smoke. Every now and then a sheet of flame would be encountered that completely crossed the tracks. The trainmen would open the throttles, and at top speed the cars dashed through as if they realized that on them depended the safety of hundreds of precious lives. Often coaches caught fire, but the flames were soon put out. In places the ties of the track were burning. Many of the men, however, remained and fought heroically for their homes; it was a hopeless fight, however, but they kept doggedly at it. Many of the people were caught in the path of the fire and burned to death, as at times the flames were moving faster than the people could run. Probably at least two hundred lost their lives. Fifteen minutes after the first house caught on the town side of the river bank, the entire place was a seething mass of flames; the roar of the fire, the crash of falling buildings and walls, mingled with the shriek of panic-stricken refugees, made up a scene that will never be forgotten by the survivors. A dense cloud of black smoke hung like a pall over the doomed district and gave notice to distant settlers and towns of their impending fate.

"The Old Town," the district of Fernie where most of the miners live, was burned first and the business section followed. The mills of the Elko River Lumber Company, covering thirty acres, were food for the flames but for a short time, and then the fire went rapidly through the better residential where once was a prosperous community of a thousand people.

The wave of flame varied from one to three miles wide. It moved eastward rapidly, climbing mountains, sweeping down into valleys and gorges, jumping across rivers and streams. Hosmer shared the fate of Fernie, though the people were better able to make their escape as they had been notified of the fire's coming. Michel is a town twenty miles beyond Fernie, and the people began early to prepare for the inevitable and leave with what personal belongings they could carry with them. A train of box cars was made up and these were sent on safety.

Canada responded once to the call for help from British Columbia. Physicians and nurses were sent in on special trains, as were ten and large quantities of supplies. After the fire had passed at least three thousand people gathered in Fernie without shelter or food. Tents were erected and many of the people said that they would remain and help build a new city. A large number, however, left over the Canadian Pacific Railway for Cranbrook, where they were sheltered and fed in relief stations and in private homes. Sir Wilfred Laurier and the Cabinet have been furthering relief measures.

The bridges over the river were burned while a number of people were endeavoring to escape across the timbers. Some, finding their escape cut off in this direction, waded out into the river as far as they dared in the swift current and waited for the fire to burn itself out. Even in the water the intense heat, generated by miles of burning timber, almost seemed to burn their faces. A great many are suffering from burns who did not actually come into contact with the flames. The air itself "seemed to be red hot." In fact, many of the houses caught without the flames from other buildings coming in contact with them. All the while the town was pelted with burning brands from the mountain sides. Branches, two to three inches thick and several feet long, were hurled through the air great distances by the storm. Two or three buildings are alone standing to show

CANADA'S EVANGELISTIC CAMPAIGN

By M. A. MARTIN

THE Canadian Presbyterian Assembly, held recently in Winnipeg, inaugurated plans for the furthering of evangelism throughout the church in Canada. Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman was asked to speak on the subject of "World-wide Evangelism."

He was accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Parley E. Zartmann, assistant secretary and treasurer of the Presbyterian General Assembly's Committee on Evangelistic Work. Upon their arrival they were entertained at luncheon, meeting a large number of business men and many ministers and elders.

An informal address, full of inspiration, sympathy, and power, was given by Dr. Chapman. The warmth infused by Dr. Chapman prepared the Assembly for the strong and sane and enthusiastic presentation of evangelism which was given later in the afternoon.

The Assembly appointed a committee to confer with Dr. Chapman and report upon the whole subject of evangelism. Of this committee, Dr. Gordon was chosen convener.

The report presented to the General Assembly by the committee recommends the appointing of a Special General Assembly's Committee on Evangelism, organized to cover the whole Dominion, with three sections: the maritime, central and western section, and a convener over each section, with corresponding committees in synods and presbyteries.

The General Committee is to consist of a number of picked men, together with district and synodical conveners. The assembly has nominated Dr. Gordon as general convener and his acceptance is hoped for. He has consented in the meantime, however, to act, and has associated with himself some of the strongest men in the Canadian church.

The plan is to conduct throughout this year three simultaneous campaigns, one in the maritime district, possibly at Halifax; one in the central, in Toronto or Hamilton, and one at the coast, in Vancouver. Conferences will be held with the ministers and everything possible will be done to educate them in this kind of work. "Dr. Chapman," says Dr. Gordon, "achieved great things for us in the space of a few hours. Evangelistic campaigns will mean a great deal for Canada."

HIS FORTUNE GIVEN TO CHARITY

The Schrader Clubhouse for Social Workers

WHEN the great Fayerweather bequests came out a few years ago, from a man of whose fabulous wealth few had ever heard, people looked at each other and said, "It must be that every other man one meets is a millionaire."

Surely there are many great, unsuspected fortunes in our country, and behind them, thank God! are many loving and generous hearts. The latest of these unknown rich, who has come into public view through his munificent gifts, is Mr. George H. F. Schrader, who has donated a clubhouse for social workers and a home for convalescent mothers at Hartsdale, N. Y. Both of these institutions are under the care of the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, which insures their wise management. They are solidly and conveniently built, and furnished artistically. The fact that both of them are for classes which have hitherto received little consideration at the hands of our philanthropists, shows that Mr. Schrader has given not only of his money but of his original thought. He early made himself useful as an inventor of clever mechanical devices. He has now invented two new charities. Already this noble steward of the Lord has dispensed more than half a million dollars for the good of the public, and the end is not yet.

"But," you ask, "how could he make such a fortune as is implied in this great gift, and yet remain so totally unknown to fame?"

That is what all the newspaper men are asking themselves as they metaphorically tear their hair over their ignorance—but none of them had ever heard of Mr. Schrader until the prominent and beautiful testimony to his existence flashed upon them and upon the rest of the world in the Clubhouse for Social Workers and the Caroline Rest Home, so called in memory of the donor's mother.

Inquiry developed that his wealth had been amassed by his father and himself in the business of manufacturing diving apparatus, hose couplings, and pipes and brass fittings for rubber goods. Their establishment is on Rose Street in the dark and dingy quarter beneath the Brooklyn Bridge. The elder Schrader has died and the firm name has become "A. Schrader's Son, Inc."

Mr. G. H. F. Schrader is a bachelor and lives in a quiet farmhouse at Hartsdale. Its furnishings are unpretentious but thoroughly artistic, for its owner has traveled extensively, is fond of art and music, and knows many of our foremost connoisseurs. He is also a writer and has published at least one work, a poetic satire in German.

A reporter of the New York Tribune recently gained access to Mr. Schrader's home and gives an almost thrilling description of the causes which led him to become interested in philanthropy. He had already invented several devices, notably the air valve used in all bicycle and automobile tires, when he read an advertisement calling for funds for the Seaside Hospital. Upon inquiring into the matter, he sent the institution a check for $10,000. Then he invented especially for this hospital a window which gives unlimited ventilation by disappearing in a groove at the top of the casing. This great help to the sickroom he allows to be used freely in Bellevue and other hospitals.

Every brick was set and article bought for the two chief charities of Mr. Schrader, under his own personal supervision, which is as keen and watchful as that of Dr. Klopsch for Mont-Lawn. The most generous comfort and the most perfect taste are visible in the Clubhouse and in the Caroline Rest, where mothers may go for recuperation after childbirth, and where the scientific management of infants is taught. One mother of thirteen children, when a patient there, confessed that she had never known how to care properly for her little ones, though she supposed that she was letter perfect in the art.

As there are more than 2,000 social workers in New York City alone, and as employees of the large charity organizations, and of the Board of Health, and the nurses in the city hospitals are also beneficiaries of the Clubhouse for Social Workers, it will be seen that its good effects are likely to be far-reaching. The world is deeply indebted to Mr. Schrader not only for what he has done, but for the manly and unostentatious methods which he has pursued in doing it.

STREET PREACHING BY MEGAPHONE

"YOU'RE saving us a lot of trouble over here," said a policeman as he welcomed a group of workers from the Evangelistic Committee of New York City who came one hot August day to conduct an afternoon meeting in that section of the city formerly known as Hell's Kitchen, but now called by the less objectionable yet more characteristic name, "San Juan Hill."

In the four blocks bounded by Sixtieth and Sixty-fourth Streets and Tenth and Eleventh Avenues live about 16,000 people, black and white, mostly black. The atmosphere of the place is discord. Race riots prevail, fierce and bloody. Each street has its "gang" which will not allow boys from other streets to enter or even to cross its special territory. Into this district have come preachers and singers, speaking in no uncertain tone as to the wages of sin and the need of salvation. Street meetings are held every night, all the evening long, during the summer. An earnest young colored evangelist, Benjamin Glasco, and the Rev. C. L. Butler, pastor of the St. James Presbyterian Church (colored), preach and exhort and plead with sinners, both black and white.

Occasional afternoon meetings have been held from four to six o'clock. Even at that hour of day, a great crowd gathers. Waiters, coal-heavers out of work, bartenders, thieves, pickpockets, loafers, colored women, the poor and shabby and vicious and criminal, huddle in a solid mass of pitiful humanity, pressing close to the speaker, who hurls his words so loudly through a megaphone that the hundreds of men and women leaning from the open windows cannot fail to hear the Gospel texts and the ringing words of denunciation of sin and the hope of salvation.

"The real dens and dives are gone," says Mr. Butler, "as a direct result of the evangelistic work done in this place. Two have been turned into chapels, where meetings are held regularly on Sundays and on week-day evenings. Sunday School, too, is held, and some of the women (converts of the tents located here in past summers) go up and down the streets on Sunday morning, collecting the children who would not dare to venture off their own streets alone."

Following the work of last year, a union Bible class was organized with Mr. Glasco as leader, Miss Beatrice Baisden as instructress, and Mr. Hebson as president. All of the officers are tent converts, as well as Mrs. Cain, who opens her home to the class for their meetings.

"It is a great demonstration of faith in the pure Gospel," says the Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the Evangelistic Committee, "when simple men like our Italian and colored young preachers can carry the message to those of their own race with such remarkable results."

PROHIBITION'S HOPEFUL OUTLOOK By HON. EUGENE W. CHAFIN, Presidential Candidate

WHEN the first National Convention was held by the Prohibition Party to nominate a candidate for the presidency in 1872, there was but one State in the Union (Maine) which had accepted the doctrine of absolute prohibition. We have since gone through nine presidential campaigns. During that time, we have been one of the means of educating the people of the United States to believe that the liquor traffic ought to be destroyed. Now we come into the tenth great national campaign with eight great States under prohibition, more than 1,000 counties, and 10,000 towns, cities and villages under prohibition. During the last four years, no question has received so much attention in American politics as this one of "What is to be done with the saloon?"

We firmly believe that a majority of the Republicans, a majority of the Democrats, and a majority of the voters in all of the other political parties believe in the principles we advocate. We claim that no other political party at any period in our history has made such marvelous progress by having the voters accept their doctrines, as the Prohibition Party people have in these few years.

We present the only platform upon which a majority of the voters of this nation are agreed. If every man who believes in our platform should vote our party ticket this year, I firmly believe we would carry the electoral college by a plurality of votes in every State in the Union. No other political party in the past seventy-five years can say that.

If the above statements are an accurate estimate of our strength, why should anybody be discouraged who belongs to the ranks of the Prohibition Party?

Whether we win or not simply depends upon the question of whether these voters place in the ballot box their convictions, or their former political prejudice. We are going to win this battle. The voters will see that this liquor traffic be destroyed. The numbers of such voters are increasing and will continue to increase until the last grog-shop in America is wiped out.

Yours for victory,

EUGENE W. CHAFIN.

THE ESPERANTO CONVENTION

THE Esperanto Convention met in Chautauqua, N. Y., July 19 to 25. The Sunday service was conducted in Esperanto, Rev. Mr. Dutton presiding. In opening the Congress, on Monday, President Vincent of Chautauqua made an address, saying he believed the success of Esperanto was assured. About 200 Esperantists were present, including delegates from the different States and many Canadians.

"The Esperanto Association of North America" was founded by the Convention, uniting all the different branches of the Esperanto movement on this continent. A vote of thanks was given to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for its good work for Esperanto. The Convention decided to invite the Fifth Universal Esperanto Convention to Chautauqua in August, 1909, and Mr. Privat will go to Dresden to try to get the approaching Fourth Universal Esperanto Convention to accept the invitation for its successor. Mr. Privat reports that a great many teachers have taken up Esperanto in the hope of going out next season and teaching it in the different States.

Another Attack on the Bible

CHICAGO UNIVERSITY is becoming famous for its intermittent outbursts of "advanced" theology. Like certain volcanic cones, it is quiescent for protracted periods; but there is no foretelling when a new eruption may take place. The latest occurred a few days ago, when a magazine edited by the professors of the University School printed a collection of articles declaring in favor of "a sane expression of religious convictions," and attacking and deriding the time-honored and most sacred beliefs of orthodox Christians. The miracles associated with the Saviour's temptation are pronounced "fanciful." "Jungle preaching" (preaching the simple Gospel to the heathen) should be abandoned and biological and electrical laboratory work substituted as being more effective. The plain old Gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ must give way, these Chicago professors assure us, before the gospel of science, "which is to become the dominant spirit of the intellectual life of the Occident." One of the professors puts the whole case of the Chicago theologians in a nutshell by pooh-poohing Christianity in the following language, which shows how far afield these advocates of a scientific gospel have wandered in their investigations:

However valuable and significant may be elements of primitive Christianity, these are by no means unparalleled in other religions. Instead of regarding Christianity as a unique revelation we find it simply one among the religions of human history. It can no longer be said to possess absolute truth in any historical form.

This Chicago fulmination, which is an odd jumble of "new theology" and "higher criticism," is the logical climax of a course which this particular group has been following for a long time past. Those who tread that dark path are heading for the spiritual wilderness. The history of Christianity shows that all attempts to poison "the sources of eternal truth" and to take away the hope of the world and give nothing in return, have resulted in failure. What Gladstone aptly termed "the impregnable rock of sacred Scripture" stands invulnerable still. To efface the wonders of God's love and Christ's ministry and sacrifice by scientific demonstration; to extinguish or even dim the light which the Saviour of men gave to the world, are tasks as far beyond the power of vain human intellectuality as heaven is above the earth. Hence the Chicago scientists' attack will not move the great body of believers one hair's breadth. Unless one loves and trusts God, one cannot understand his Word or profit by it. Its truths are still hidden from the wise ones of the world and revealed to the simple.

Higher criticism is an elastic term, which includes very much, from the boldest atheism to the sincerest faith. It is a school which insists on the completest historical, scientific and philosophical investigation in the interpretation of the Scriptures and the Christian religion. The most radical of the school are called "destructive critics," who deny the supernatural in the historical record of the Scriptures and in the person and life of Christ, and who lead their followers into the dreariest agnosticism. But higher criticism also includes many devout students of the Scripture and loyal followers of Christ, whose faith is greatly strengthened by the technical study of the Scriptures and by the concurrence of reason with faith in their interpretation. Fortunately, the actual truth of the Bible or Christianity is not dependent upon the interpretation of any school of theologians. Human estimates of Scriptural meaning may change from age to age, but the real truth cannot change. A good Providence will bring out of such theological agitation a stronger faith in the Book and an intenser love for the Saviour.

Count Zeppelin's Misfortune

WHEN Icarus, the son of Dædalus, according to the old myth, came to grief while attempting to fly to Sicily with a pair of artificial wings which were scorched by the sun, the people of those early days no doubt were divided in opinion whether his fate was not a judgment for rashly attempting the conquest of the air. Had he lived in the twentieth century, he would probably have used a balloon or aeroplane, and might have succeeded. Count Zeppelin, foremost of European aviators, after some remarkable performances in Switzerland with his monster balloon, has lost his airship through the stroke of a lightning bolt, while it was undergoing repairs in the open country near Stuttgart. It was a fortunate thing for the Count and his party that they were on solid ground when the airship caught fire and was swept away in the storm, otherwise they might have shared the fate of the unlucky Icarus. The Count's balloon, we are told, was as long as an ocean liner, and the car could carry twenty-five passengers, and had comfortable sleeping quarters. On a recent trip, he ascended with fifteen passengers, two of them being royalties. It can thus be seen that the accident at Stuttgart missed by a narrow margin being the most sensational tragedy in the whole history of aerial navigation.

There will be no lack of money to build a new Zeppelin dirigible. His exploits have awakened Germany's admiration and a fund is now being raised, the government having contributed $125,000.

Breaking Up Hazing

HAZING, which is a custom probably as old as college and cadet life, would seem to be well-nigh ineradicable. Just now, the case of the group of young hazers who have been threatened with dismissal from West Point is the subject of serious consideration by the President and Secretary of War; but whether expulsion will be enforced has not yet been finally determined. In any event, there should be sufficient authority either at Washington or West Point to effectually put a stop to the senseless and frequently brutal horseplay which still flourishes at the Military Academy in the face of official admonitions and prohibitive orders. Perhaps a way quite as effective as dismissal, though less drastic, might be found in lowering the rating of offenders, so that convicted hazers would find their pastime a serious detriment to advancement.

Some of the disclosures in the West Point cases indicate a state of affairs which the whole country would be glad to see promptly corrected. The offenders were convicted and their dismissal recommended by a Board of officers and the Superintendent; but they were afterward reinstated. It is an anomaly that, in an institution of the first class, there should be such an utter lack of discipline. The plea that hazing is harmless and teaches the soldier's first duty—obedience—is unworthy of consideration. If the public has formed any opinion on the matter, it is more likely to class it as uniformed rowdiness.

The Turkish Parliament

ON JULY 24, Abdul Hamid, the Sultan of Turkey, surprised the world and his own subjects as well, by granting to his people a constitution and a parliament, to be assembled as soon as deputies can be elected. This action is a step toward the removal of the last absolute despotism upon the soil of Europe; Russia, the only other absolute power that has dared to oppose the spirit of the age, having also granted to its people a parliament.

This sudden move of the Sultan was a desperate step, intended to save his throne from overthrow. The Young Turk political party—which is really a rebellion—is in possession of nearly the whole of the empire. The army and civil authorities have surrendered to the leaders of the Young Turks in most of the large towns, especially in European Turkey. The immediate cause of the Emperor's action was the receipt of a telegram, addressed to him by the Albanians of Uskub, informing him that they had taken an oath in favor of the re-establishment of the constitution. This telegram was a thunderbolt, as the Sultan thought that they were the most loyal of his subjects.

The constitution granted is practically the same as that of 1876, the chief provisions of which are the indivisibility of the empire; the supremacy of the Sultan; individual liberty; freedom of all creeds, of the press and of education; equal legal taxation; a senate and two chambers; general election by ballot every fourth year; judges for life. The first Turkish parliament was opened March 19, 1878, with thirty senators and ninety deputies, but a month afterward Russia declared war on Turkey and the Turkish constitution and parliament were things of the past. The present Sultan has paid no attention whatever to any of the constitutional limitations of his absolute authority, and his present action is only to save his throne and perhaps his head. The recent attempted assassination shows his imminent danger, if bad faith is suspected.

It has been with great impatience that Europe with its free forms of government, has tolerated long this moral and political blot on the map of the continent. The Young Turks have already won congratulations for their patriotism and real loyalty to their country's highest interests. It may be possible that the Sultan has acted in time to save himself; for though he wept as he proclaimed the constitution and the parliament, if he should sincerely undertake to carry out their provisions he may have a happier reign than heretofore.

The Contrast of Ten Years

IN 1898 the war with Spain was fought and Cuba set free to make a place for herself among the family of nations. The United States had won her battles and stood ready in peace to help her in every way that would tend to the country's moral and material uplift. There were many, it is true, who predicted at the time that "Cuba Free," as their motto read, would mean freedom to have a revolution at frequent intervals, as is so often the case in other West Indian States. One revolution did occur but order was restored by the timely interference of our government and the malcontents learned that the proper place to settle their local differences was at the ballot box and not on the battlefield.

Cuba has just had its election and the lesson that violence is unwise and unprofitable has evidently been taken to heart. Everything went off in the most orderly manner, auguring well for the conduct of elections in the future. There were a few American troops on the island, and this may have had its effect. In future elections, however, it is probable that the very fact that the powerful neighbor, who has helped them often, frowns on the revolutionary spirit, will be a strong enough deterrent. Cuba is growing in prosperity and learning self-control. In a few months she will doubtless be managing all of her affairs again with a better regard for the interests of all parties, a marked and hopeful contrast to the condition of affairs in the harassed and devastated island of ten years ago.

At Home and Abroad

Mobs in France

THE industrial difficulties of France have resulted in strikes in different places. They have been incited by the National Confederation of Labor. The demonstrations have been so violent and revolutionary that the government has been compelled to employ a very strong hand in their suppression. The union of the Syndicates of the Seine intended to hold a meeting at the Labor Exchange in order to deliberate about a strike, but were forbidden by the Prefect. The meeting took place all the same owing to the ingenuity of M. Pataud, Secretary of the Syndicate of Electricity. Although access to the great glass hall was forbidden, the members shut themselves up in the thirty rooms of the courtyard surrounding the hall and at a given signal, at nine in the evening, all the windows were thrown up and at each window appeared a multitude of heads. The courtyard was lighted with Chinese lanterns and the scene was weird and exciting. The president of the organization sat at a window in the third story. The most violent outbreak was that at Ville-Neuve, Saint Georges, where the Labor Confederation had collected some 5,000 disturbers of the peace. The government forces were called out and after having given orders to the mob to disperse, as many as a dozen times, used their guns, and in the struggle a number were killed. In the Rue Montmartre the red flag was hoisted at half mast with crepe, for the martyrs of Ville-Neuve, and nearby a pasteboard effigy, hideously decorated with red paint representing the decapitated head of Prime Minister Clemenceau, was impaled on a sanguinary pole. The leaders of the Labor Confederation undertook to tie up Paris with a strike which crippled industry somewhat, but on the whole it proved to be a failure. The workmen of Paris themselves are becoming suspicious of the unwisdom and lawlessness of those who are pretending to be their champions. This Confederation of Labor in France is manifestly an anarchistic institution. In almost all nations anarchy has taken advantage of the prejudices or grievances of labor to whet its appetite for blood and promote its diabolical designs. Where the government is an absolute despotism there is more of an excuse for their revolutionary tactics, if there could be any excuse for their opposition to all good. But in republics, where the people rule, as they do in France, there is no provocation for anything illegal or revolutionary. These anarchists are the worst enemies labor can have anywhere, and the wisest and ablest men in the ranks of labor recognize this fact. In most governments, certainly in free governments, the only proper method of solution of the difficulties between capital and labor is in candid agitation, wise legislation and impartial enforcement of law. It is a good sign of the times when France declines to follow the leadership or even tolerate the revolutionary tactics of such organizations as the National Confederation of Labor.

Whose mouth is full of cursing and bitterness: their feet are swift to shed blood (Rom. 3:14-15.)

Charmed by a Serpent

Anthony Decka, riveted to the spot when he uncovered a rattlesnake by lifting a stone near Williamsport, Pa., was saved from being bitten in the face by the serpent by a fellow workman who, at a distance of twenty feet, threw a stone which killed the snake and crushed one of Decka's fingers. The man seemed charmed by the serpent and could not move, although his face, as he leaned over, was not two feet from the reptile as it coiled for a spring. There are pleasures as deadly as a rattlesnake which are exceedingly charming in their nature. Young people are fascinated by them and held powerless under their magic spell. What a fortunate thing it is that there are friends and companions near us ready to destroy these evils and rescue their fellow men from danger and death!

The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. (Gen. 3:13.)

The Fatal Sleeping Sickness

A few months ago the English government instituted a special commission, called the London National Sleeping Sickness Bureau. The fatality of the sleeping sickness was so great in the British possessions as to make this action necessary. The committee was appointed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. In 1891, this malady was introduced into Uganda, since which time 200,000, out of a population of 300,000 in the affected districts, succumbed. The malady runs a course of from four to eight months, ending in continuous drowsiness and a last long sleep. Technical medical investigation has discovered the cause of the disease—the are slaughtered, dressed and packed. There are five mammoth reservoirs on the farm, costing $500,000, and 300 wells scattered over the estate, which cost another $500,000. The proprietor is a scientific farmer and raises every kind of grain in his fields. His farmhouse is said to be the most magnificent one in the world, costing $2,000,000 and capable of entertaining 500 guests. The gardens are beautifully laid out and the stables are more magnificent than those of any earthly emperor. On the homestead alone are employed 100 male servants. Don Luis was at one time Governor of Chihuahua, but he tired of political life and longed for larger liberty and a greater variety of employment. He has a beautiful wife and twelve children; seven sons and five daughters. The sons are actively engaged with him in superintending the ranch, while the women, who are said to be the most beautiful in Mexico, remain contentedly at the homestead. The children were educated in the United States and have traveled extensively throughout the world.

He is richer than any three men in Mexico and is benevolent in spirit and generous in his contributions to worthy enterprises. Farming is the basis of all other industries. The farm is the physical support of the race. Farmers and herdsmen of olden times often had vast estates and munificent incomes.

Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. (Gen. 13:14-15.)

Thought It a Sheath Gown

A young lady of nineteen years of age, accompanied by her mother, having returned home to New York in the evening from Arverne, appeared upon the streets of Harlem about six o'clock in the evening attired in a green and white tight fitting skirt with a circular overskirt embellished with a band of bright green satin—altogether a rich and striking costume. As they came down the steps of the Third Avenue "L" station, a street urchin, noticing the singular costume of the young lady, cried out: "Pipe the sheath." Others took up the cry and fell in behind the blushing and embarrassed wearer of the garment as she hurried along the street. The crowd became so large and pressed upon her so closely that, in sheer desperation, she was compelled to enter a store for protection. Her father and the police headquarters were telephoned and the father and two policemen reached the store at about the same time. A mob was howling about the building, prying through the windows and doors to catch a glimpse of the young lady. The mob had grown so large that the two policemen were powerless to remove it, and reserves were called out, who with fists and clubs drove back the dense throng. It took an hour and a half to clear the streets so that the young lady with her mother and father could return to their home. The garment the young lady wore was not a sheath gown.

The idle remark of a street urchin made all the trouble. What a great fire a small spark often kindles! But the loud dressing of the young lady prompted the remark of the boy, and a little better taste in her wardrobe would have saved her the mortifying notoriety which she had. So much has been said about the sheath skirt of Paris that very many in that great throng had a curiosity to know what one really looked like. It is likely, however, that too large a number followed the young lady because of the hint of immodesty which the garment is supposed to represent. Paris has many beautiful things which America could adopt to great advantage, but there are excesses and immodesties in wearing apparel among women which it would be a folly and shame for Americans to imitate. It is not probable that the sheath gown will ever become popular or even tolerated by the best people of our country.

In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel. (1 Tim. 2:9.)

All the ills that flesh is heir to are symbols of the disease of the soul. A real cure has been provided for this in the blood that was shed on Calvary.

Biggest Farm on Earth

Don Luis Terrazas, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, is said to be the owner of the largest farm in the world. It is 150 miles north and south, by 200 miles east and west, and includes 8,000,000 acres of land. On its mountains and through its valleys there roam 1,000,000 head of cattle, 700,000 sheep and 100,000 horses. The horsemen, herdsmen, shepherds and hunters number an army of 2,000 men. This ranch is the only one in the world which maintains its own slaughtering and packing plant. Each year 150,000 head of cattle and 100,000 sheep

THE RISE OF THE SCHOOL CITY

OVER the Temple of Apollo at Delphi the Greeks carved in letters of gold the motto that has become immortal, "Know Thyself." To these words the Roman added, centuries later, "Conquer thyself." The plan of the School City originated by Mr. Wilson L. Gill is to teach the youth of the land the principles of practical self-government, of studying out where the deficiencies lie in personal and municipal government, and of knitting themselves into active working civic centres, thus preparing themselves to be worthy citizens in the land to which they owe allegiance. It is a fine idea, and is today demonstrated as a working reality, the School City organization being a feature in schools from Denver to Omaha, from Omaha to Philadelphia, in Mexico, Cuba, Scotland, South Africa, the Argentine Republic, and Japan.

The School City is a method of moral and civic education during the years when training has its most lasting effect. "Personal self-control and personal influence in the control of others for the common good of all is the keynote," says Mr. Ray, the principal of the John Crevor School, Chicago.

It means, in a very real way, the uplift of the individual; for the individual learns the mighty force of law. "Children are always asking, 'Is it right?'" whispered the principal of a high school to a visitor; and in this she touched upon a truth that is a vital element in the successful working of this system of student self-government towards the forces that make for right.

The School City being an organization of the pupils of a school into the city form of government, the pupils are citizens. The three divisions of popular government—legislative, executive and judicial—are established. The pupils elect from their own number a mayor, judge, city clerk, six policemen, city council, one director of public safety, and one of public works. Each room in the school bears the same resemblance to the entire school as that of a ward to a city, electing ordinarily two members to the School City Council, and being apportioned its quota of police officers, etc. Elections are held at least four times a year, candidates for any office being girls as well as boys. Responsibility for the good order and discipline of the whole school rests upon the pupils themselves as citizens of the School City. The principal of the school gives advice and supervises this pupil self-government.

The history of the inception of the School City is a very interesting one. Mr. Wilson L. Gill, LL.B., a graduate of Yale, and one of the organizers of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, suggested some years ago to the teacher of a particularly unruly school in upper New York City, where a policeman was detailed to keep order in the yard, the experiment of making the children assume the responsibility of maintaining order. Mr. Gill suggested that the pupils be organized into a self-governing body with a legislature, executive and judge of their own election. It was done. The boys and girls were enthusiastic over the new plan. Quickly, excellent order was established in the classes, and a proud sense of individual responsibility for correct guidance of himself, of herself, was established in the little school community.

Mr. Gill saw at once the enormous moral as well as civic value of his plan, and gave up important business affairs upon which he was engaged to introduce this system everywhere. He spent two years in Cuba, engaged by the United States Government to introduce his system in all the public schools of the island. In recognition of the value of the Gill School City system, and of its usefulness, the Franklin Institute, one of the most famous scientific societies in the world, awarded to the originator the Elliott Cresson gold medal and diploma. At a School City banquet given by the Franklin Institute, a letter was read from President Roosevelt, which endorsed the city system. Says President Roosevelt, "Nothing could offer higher promise for the future of our country than your successful plan."

Let us take a peep into the practical working operations of the School City. Entirely unexpected the writer presented herself at the Thirteenth Avenue Public School, Newark, N. J., one of the largest in the country. She was received by its principal, Professor Martin L. Cox, with great courtesy, and instantly given every opportunity to test the value of the School City method. Here were one thousand two hundred and five children; and here was dignity of deportment, ambition, happy discipline—in a word, law and order; and this maintained by the children themselves. Upon a second visit, when the school was decorated in honor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer heard the newly elected "mayor"—Nelson Rogers, a boy of thirteen—make his speech of acceptance of office from the platform and in the presence of the hushed and crowded rooms and of the distinguished guests present. It was a very good speech.

The writer also witnessed the casting of ballots for the election of aldermen. Mr. Gill had told the writer that between laughter and tears she would scarcely be able to control her facial muscles—laughter at the delicious earnestness of the miniature legislators, and tears of joy at the splendid work being done by the little people themselves. Another practical working of the School City is the council. The members of the School City Council of a well-known school gather for their twenty-minute fortnightly session in a large room on the upper floor. About sixty children, from eight to twelve years of age, compose the assembly. About one-half the number when the writer was present were girls. The clerk called the roll. "Leon Aravinsk has been absent from council three times, and loses his seat," declared the clerk. A "councilman" arose to speak. "I think the children ought not to make a noise in the streets going home, and disturb the library," said the councilman. "Who knows anything about this?" asked the clerk. A half-dozen councilmen, half of whom were girls, sprang to their feet to reply. A resolution was promptly passed requesting the school to be more quiet on the street.

When one of the mayors of New York first visited a School City in New York City, says the New York Sun, he insisted upon meeting all the School City officials, and then inquired as to the process of law in the "city." He was hugely delighted when he was told that a regular trial had been held the week before; that a police captain accused of dereliction of duty had been the prisoner, and that he had been convicted and dismissed from the service. Thereupon the mayor of New York asked that the "court" be brought before him, and his amusement was prodigious when he saw that the presiding judge was a girl.

One of the illustrations gives a "trial" being held "court." A truant is being tried by jury in

School Mayor Being Inducted into Office

School City of the great Thirteenth Avenue Public School, Newark, N. J. It will be observed that every feature of civil procedure is followed in this School City Court. Here is the presiding judge—a girl unanimously elected by boys and girls. The clerk of the court bears the famous name of Edward Everett; here is the witness to the truant's guilt; the jury, the lawyers, etc. The proceedings go on with the gravity of our city courts. This is reality. Yonder truant will not run away again. The earnestness of the little people is remarkable. Another picture shows the newly elected mayor of the School City of the Thirteenth Avenue Public School, Newark, N. J. He is taking the oath of office before the principal. Old Glory waves over his head! The School City inculcates the taking of honors modestly, the bearing of defeat with courtesy.

The question of woman suffrage had lately been agitated in the School City. The resolution was passed after much serious headshaking and owl-like deliberation. "The girls may have a chance to vote in our school State, so that they will know how to do it better if ever they are let to when they grow up!"

Hats Off in This Church

AMONG the regular announcements printed each week in the calendar of the Temple Baptist Church, Los Angeles, Calif., Rev. Robert J. Burdette, pastor, is the following:

"Out of Christian consideration for others, the women will please remove their hats before the beginning of the sermon."

There is general conformity with a request so courteous and so Christian. In a large audience of several thousand there will, of course, be occasional transgressors. When the number of transgressors is exasperatingly large, the startled ears of the offenders are in danger of being greeted with a pronouncement from the pastor, usually the gentlest of men, which usually is in this spoken form:

"If the lady with the becoming hat will kindly notice how hard the man behind her is dodging, trying to see the preacher, she will undoubtedly be obliging enough to take down her millinery, postpone her halo, and conform to the customs of this church." The effect is generally satisfactory to the audience, and the wearer's self-respect is preserved in a trying episode.

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

Going Shopping

THE charge is frequently made that while men are the earners of money women are the spenders. This is only partially true. Among the well-to-do classes, where the income is not straitened and women pass a good deal of their lives in idleness, shopping is a sort of diversion. Women buy articles of dress and ornament simply that they may fill up time that is hanging heavy on their hands, and also to gratify a taste for the beautiful. Millions of women never have any superfluous cash. When they purchase a new gown or a bonnet or plan for a daughter's trousseau or the outfit of a son who is going to college, they have to count carefully if they would avoid the distress of debt. It is, notwithstanding the constant expression of a different opinion, the exceptional woman who is comfortable when she knows she is plunging her husband into debt, and living beyond her means. There are, of course, extravagant women just as there are extravagant men, but the sex as a whole is thrifty.

A minister's wife who came from a country home to visit a friend in the city was asked whether she did not want to go the rounds of the big department stores. Her hostess thought that, to the resident of a rural community in the mountains, the sight of acres of space, brilliant with silks and glittering with jewels, the spoils of all the lands under a single roof, would be as interesting as a great exposition.

"No," said the little lady of the manse, "I haven't any money to spare, and my only interest in shops is to get little things that I want. I am not anxious to look at things for sale when I am not a buyer, and I would not like to occupy the time of tired clerks to no purpose. The parks and picture galleries and museums, the wonderful tall buildings and the crowds in the streets are enough to satisfy every possible wish that I can have for amusement. Shopping with me has always been just about the most serious business in life."

There are women, no doubt, who without the intention of spending money until an indefinite future, still enjoy inspecting furniture, china, linen, curios, furs and lace. Few women can look at lace without a yearning of the heart to own at least a little bit of it, and as for linen, Eve's daughters know its value and prize it, if they are housekeepers, above gems and gold. A woman of eighty was made supremely happy on her last birthday by the gift of some beautiful rose-point lace. She had longed for it for years, but had never felt justified in purchasing it for herself.

Not long ago, one friend, showing another over her well-appointed home, said: "Now I am going to give you a glimpse into my one weakness. I want you to see my linen closet."

The friend looked at the shelves, each with its white burden of sheets, pillow-slips and towels, daintily arranged in sets, fragrant with lavender, everything included in abundance to satisfy the most fastidious desire, and sighing she exclaimed:

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"It is pretty hard to see this and not break the tenth commandment."

Before going on a shopping expedition a woman should make a list of "must-haves" and "may-haves." Her list should be classified so that no time shall be wasted in going from one floor to another. The department stores in the large towns are so finely arranged for convenience that no one need waste precious hours if her memoranda are definitely set forth. To pay in cash or on delivery of the goods is wiser than to purchase on credit, unless one has a generous bank account or is very certain of her power to withstand temptation. A charge account is a temporary convenience, but many women discover that payment a month hence gives them a loop-hole for recklessness that they regret when the bill comes in.

The Child Eternal

I heard their prayers and kissed their sleepy eyes,
And tucked them in all warm from feet to head,
To wake again with morning's glad sunrise—
Then came where he lay dead.
On cold, still mouth I laid my lips. Asleep
He lay, to wake the other side God's door,
But this one mine no more.

Those other children long to men have grown—
Strange, hurried men, who give me passing thought,
Then go their ways. No longer now my own,
Without me they have wrought.
So when night comes, and seeking mother's knee,
I fold him close—the child that's left to me,
Tired childish feet turn home at eventide,
My little lad who died.

Concerning Domestic Pets

A NEW ENGLAND correspondent has written very earnestly to the editor of this page begging that attention may be called to the neglect of domestic pets in summer. Much cruelty is shown by thoughtless owners of cats who leave their homes during hot weather, without making an adequate provision for the shelter and food of these home-loving creatures. The poor cats prowl about in search of food and drink, grow thin and mangy, become a target for heedless boys and arouse the enmity of those whom they disturb by their cries, while their should-be protectors are at a distance. Of all creatures who are petted and cared for, the cat is the most dependent and responds most quickly to kind treatment. A superb specimen of the feline race, admired by all who see him, was, when brought into his home by a little boy, a poor skeleton of a tramp cat that nobody would have looked at a second time—nobody, that is, except a loving child.

When leaving home for weeks or months, if you can not find any one to care for your cat, do not leave it to the haphazard of neglect, but mercifully put it to sleep with chloroform. Other pets in summer, birds, dogs or rabbits, must be provided with the food they like, and daily supplied with pure water to drink. Birdcages should not be left in the full glare of the sun. Children should never be permitted to neglect pets for which they are responsible. An important part of juvenile education is carried forward where young people possess pets and take daily and proper care of them.

A large number of letters have lately been received from the children, and if they will have just a little patience, an announcement will soon be made as to the winners of prizes for the best letters and of names that shall go upon an honor roll. The children who have little gardens may write to

Aunt Payson and tell her what they are cultivating. The children who have chickens may write about them, and those who have pets of any sort, particularly odd pets, are invited to send their description. Aunt Payson will be glad to hear about any act of heroism performed by a child. Of course children have not always the chance to be heroic in great things, but please understand that we may be as heroic in the little things of daily life, in bearing small disappointments and in making small sacrifices, as in saving people from drowning or doing anything that challenges public attention.

You can write about your brothers and sisters, your school contests, the teacher you like and the teacher who you fancy is cross. You may tell about your games and contests and your collections. If you are a child of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family you are one of Aunt Payson's nieces or nephews. She can not give you very much space in the paper, but your small corner shall be entirely your own, and no grown persons shall be permitted to crowd in.

GODLIKE LOVE FOR ENEMIES*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

But we do not need to go so far away to find what love will do for the enemy.

An Indian Story

In the early days of our own land, there was a lonely little farm belonging to a Quaker family on the bank of the Delaware River. Neither bolt nor bar had ever been placed upon the dwelling. There was only a latchstring in the door, and that they let out by day and night. They said, "This is our defense. Without him we are quite defenseless in this solitary place. With him we are in perfect safety. Often they were warned of the ravages committed by brands of prowling Indians. One day a messenger came to bid them be on guard, for there was special danger.

About midnight Nathan Edwar said to his wife: "Rhoda, does this member we took in the latchstring this evening?" "Yes, Nathan, it did," answered she, "but what that?" "We have always trusted the Lord," he said, "and he has never failed us. I'm thinking it looks like fear to pull it in, so I am minded to get up and hang it out again." This she readily assented, and the latchstring was hung out as usual. Half an hour afterward Nathan and Rhoda heard steps outside, and knew that the Indians had really come. Alas, that they were wholly without their mercy! The door was noiselessly opened, and there was a muttered conversation in the native tongue, just on the threshold. The husband and wife clasped hands silently and committed themselves to the Almighty Keeper. Then, very softly, the door was closed, and quietly the Indians stole away. At sunrise the farmer and his wife could see no trace on their premises of their midnight visitors, though the smoke of burning dwellings in the distance told them the sad tale of pillage and murder around them. How came that savage band to spare the Quaker home? No one until years afterwards did it; occupants learn the reason. Then an Indian who had been of the party told the effect the hung-out latchstring had on the chief, bent though he was on revenge and plunder. "See," he said, "these people are not afraid of us, for their latchstring is out, and they can not be our enemies. They are protected by the Great Spirit, and we will let them alone." Orders were also given that at no other time should they be molested.

Mrs. Mary E. Howell, widow of Mitchell Howell, formerly of Centre Moriches, L. I., died at her home at Dias Creek, N. J., aged nearly seventy years.

Passed away at her home in Boonton, N. J., April 29, 1908, Mrs. Sarah C. Lyon, in her eighty-third year. For seventeen years she was a member of The Christian Herald family.

Roland R. Rathbun, of Bridgewater, Conn., passed away April 27. He was a member of the Society of Friends for many years and a true Christian, the last word on his dying lips being "Jesus." He was a kind father and loving husband.

Deacon Benjamin N. Webb entered into rest December 4, 1907, at his home in South Weary, N. H., at the age of 82 years. He was a member of the Congregational Church from early manhood and was a true and constant Christian, having a kind disposition and was everybody's friend.

Miss Mary A. Wilbour, of Newport, R. I., entered into rest at the age of nearly ninety-one years. She was a woman of fine education, and was a teacher for many years. She was an earnest Christian, and always keenly alive to spiritual and political conditions of the whole world. She was greatly interested in her much loved Christian Herald.

Frederick Ditzel departed this life at his home near Columbiana, O., May 3, 1908, in the eightieth year of his age. He was a native of Germany, coming to this country when 25 years of age. He was a member of the Bible Christian Church, in which he was an esteemed and active worker. For many years he was an interested reader of The Christian Herald.

THE spear and the cruse—we will take them as symbols of self-control. They belonged to King Saul. The spear or javelin was both his weapon and sceptre. When he lay down to sleep at night, the spear was thrust in the ground at his head, like a standard. The cruse was a richly ornamented water bottle, which was also placed at his head that he might refresh himself in the night if he should awake. In all of this it does not appear how the spear and the cruse may be taken as emblems of self-control. But if an enemy had come upon Saul in the night as he lay sleeping, and had only taken the spear and the cruse away when he might easily have killed the king, that would be a remarkable case of self-control and something more.

That is what was done by the innocent man whom Saul hunted like a wild beast. David found both Saul and his guard sleeping in a cave, and took away the spear and the cruse, that on the morrow, at safe distance, he might show them to the king as evidence that his life had been in his power, and he had refused to kill him.

David, with his young soldier cousin, Abishai, bravely penetrated the sleeping army of Saul at night until he stood at the side of the sleeping king. "Slay him," whispered Abishai. "Not so," said David, "he is the Lord's anointed." It would seem that he might have been justified in at least permitting Abishai to slay Saul, for Saul, with his three thousand men, had been in deadly pursuit of David in caves and valleys and mountains, and Saul was even then refreshing himself that he might with renewed vigor pursue David again and take his life. Now it is clear how the spear and the cruse may be taken as the emblems of self-control.

How surprised Saul must have been when he awoke and found his spear and cruse gone! The mystery was soon solved when David appeared on an adjacent hill-top, holding aloft the spear and cruse as proof that he bore no malice to his bitter foe. Saul saw that his life had been in David's hand, and that David had spared him. He felt humiliated. And David tried to make a truce with Saul: "As thy life," said David, "was much set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be much set by in the eyes of my lord, and let him deliver me out of all tribulation." Saul's better feelings were touched, and he exclaimed: "Blessed be thou, my son David; thou shalt do great things, and also shalt still prevail." And it is recorded that "David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place." Was the fire of envy extinguished in the heart of Saul, or was it only smothered? David knew too well that it would kindle again, because once before he had spared Saul's life when he found him sleeping, and had only cut off a piece of his cloak instead of his head. A picture of this scene, as painted by a Dutch artist, appears on this page. When it was shown to Saul he had said: "I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day." David feared to trust him, and therefore he went to dwell among the Philistines, considering the worst enemies of Israel less likely to harm him than the king.

How Can We Love Our Enemies?

What practical truth is there in this lesson? Plainly it is that we should love our enemies. Did David love Saul? Yes, but not as he loved Jonathan; not as friend loves friend, because there is something noble or congenial to engender love. That is the love of esteem that looks up. David did not so love Saul. Nor with the love of sympathy that is felt for congenial spirits. David loved Saul with the love of pity. He thought less of the wrong Saul was doing to him than of Saul's wronging himself. It was the love of compassion for one who wrecks an immortal life by sin. When David had played upon the harp before Saul, he sang of all the beautiful things in nature and in life, seeking to win him to a nobler life.

And David teaches us how to love our enemies and wish to do them good rather than harm. But in this case it did not save his enemy.

"Blessed Are the Merciful"

In England when the war between Royalists and Puritans was in progress (1642-49), some ladies were listening to an attack going on not far away. At last distant shouts echoed up, and finally shots came faintly on the breeze, then followed the noise of were heavy and dim. "I fight not with invalids and weaklings," said the Cavalier, gruffly; "take thy freedom, and begone."

Many years passed away. A woman was crouching at the feet of the great Cromwell, pleading for the life of her son, who, now a political prisoner, had been condemned to die. The woman looked up into the face of the dictator, and thought she traced under that steel casque the face she had leaned over and laved with rose water in bygone days. She said: "Sire, a wounded soldier fell at my gate. I took him in and attended to his bruised flesh. I protected his life and liberty. That wounded soldier I now see exalted, with power to save or destroy. For his sake, I implore pardon for my son." The stern dictator turned to the kneeling woman. He could not but recall the night when, a fugitive and at the mercy of his foes, she had saved his life. His stern look gave way, and seizing a pen he signed an order to stay the execution of the condemned Cavalier. "For the sake of the wounded soldier," he said briefly, "he is parhorsehoofs, and a dozen fleeing Puritan "Roundheads" dashed by at full gallop. The steed of one stumbled and fell, casting the rider's head heavily upon the road. The others rode on at full speed. Two young sons were called, and the wounded man was helped into the house and made comfortable upon a bed. It was a royalist's home. Not long after the oldest son of the family came in. He was clad in the picturesque dress of the Cavalier. He was determined to kill the wounded Puritan, but his mother pleaded that he should spare his life. "A monstrous thing you ask of me," he said, "and no one should dare to ask it." "No one but your mother, my son," pleaded a gentle-faced lady behind him, "and she requests as a favor what she might demand as a right. Never shall the man whom accident has made my guest be attacked in my house. Let him go free." The Puritan soldier, hearing the conversation, painfully rose, and confronted the young man. "I ask no quarter," he said, "meet me in open fight, and I will give a good account of myself. Thank you, madam, for your succor, but I need no longer trespass upon your hospitality." The Cavalier looked at the Puritan. He was hardly able to stand and his eyes done." Cromwell did not stop there. The royalist was not only reprieved from death, but after a while was given his freedom, while the safety of his mother's house was fully secured by an order written and signed by the Protector himself.

Shall we ask the sordid question: Does it pay to love your enemies? We were all enemies when God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. From whom then do we learn to love our enemies? From God. Let us try to be and do and love like him. David had learned the lesson from him, for he is the same God yesterday, to-day and forever.

There is no soul but can learn this lesson. The success of missionary work in every part of the world has shown this. The natives of Fiji not many years ago were about the most evil people on earth. Then they made cannibal feasts on their enemies. But how different now! The Fijians number about one hundred thousand. Ninety thousand of them are adherents of the Methodist Church, and for the most part the remainder are Roman Catholics. And Fiji Christians are sending missionaries to other islands.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Christian Cross-Bearing*

THE disciples had no excuse for not knowing that a death of torture was before their Lord. In many ways, he hinted at it from the first. Here he expressly describes it. The time has come for his friends to be prepared for the anguish which was imminent. Yet he reminds them of the old truth, a proverb always, but especially since his wanderings in the desert which preceded the entrance into the Promised Land, that light should ever follow darkness.

This is the law of life. Christ illustrated it in the highest and most wonderful way. But all around us in smaller instances, and all through history, this same inscrutable law holds good.

Goethe wrote:

Who ne'er his bread in sorrow ate,
Who ne'er the doleful midnight hours
Weeping upon his bed hath sate,
He knows you not, ye heavenly powers.

Suffering must precede the making of every great work. St. Gaudens labored for years upon his models. Time and again he would make for a great statue an experimental sketch which would not suit him. He would break it up, and weary, discouraged, would set himself to dream and execute a new design. Of some of the great artists of the elder day, it is said that they groveled upon the floor and wept in despair when they were trying to work out some beautiful art-ream, which came but in flashes and, as a whole, seemed to elude them. The bliss of perfection is achieved only after the agony of struggle. Only through suffering, says the poet, can we enter Paradise. This light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh out for us an exceeding weight of glory.

There are hundreds of similes to illustrate this grand truth. It is said that when the great Cecil was walking through the Botanical Gardens of Oxford, his attention was arrested by a fine pomegranate tree, cut almost through the stem near the root. On asking the gardener the reason of this, "Sir," said he, "this tree used to shoot so strong that it bore nothing but leaves. When it was cut in this manner, then it began to bear fruit." Character comes through trial, as gold from the fire.

This is the old but ever-new truth of which Christ now reminds his disciples. They cannot believe him. He, so powerful, can surely prevent such a calamity as a death of agony. He reiterates that it must be, and sternly reproves Peter with the rebuke, "You are arguing now from the earthly point of view. God's way is not man's."

He designed, no doubt, not only to impress upon them that to follow him meant self-denial and battle, but to note that he himself, almighty though he was, stood ready to set the great example. He spoke to the multitude in even more forceful terms. The love borne to God should dwarf all the natural affections until by contrast they seemed even like hatred. "Count well the cost," he repeats in varied phrases, "for my service is not easy. No one may hope to escape the cross, who aspires to wear my crown."

But the fleeting nature of this anguish is everywhere emphasized by Jesus. "It is but for a little while," and the end—how joyous it will be!

The simile of the salt which loses its savor is mentioned in three of the Gospels. The dishes of the Orient are usually more highly seasoned than ours and spices and condiments play a more conspicuous part there than we can fully appreciate. The Christians were to be the salt in every community. As the salt must be thoroughly worked into the stew or other compound, so they, permeated with love and faith, must enter into the life of the people about them, until the spirit of Christ should animate every heart.

Hamlin and Turkey*

IT IS especially appropriate that this week the great body of the Christian Endeavor Societies should discuss Turkey and its most famous missionary, Cyrus Hamlin. The reports of a new life for that besotted and barbarian empire sound more and more encouraging. Turkey is to have a constitution, with all which that implies, and several other far-reaching national improvements. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that if Cyrus Hamlin had not spent the best years of his life—nearly forty of them—in labors for the evangelization of Turkey, this vast reformation might never have dawned, or at least it might have been postponed to a far later day.

During the terrible crimes and massacres of 1895-6, the advice of Dr. Hamlin was eagerly sought by those who were endeavoring to alleviate the distresses of the wretched victims of Turkish cruelty. He helped greatly in the wise distribution of the funds raised by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and rendered invaluable aid to our government by his judicious counsels.

If he had done nothing beyond the founding and organizing of Robert College, he would have accomplished far more than most men—even men of mark. At first, the superior education of the gentle and humble Armenians, who formed the bulk of the student-body, seemed to enrage the Turks. The Armenians were able to secure more lucrative positions than the young Turks, and this naturally inflamed their jealousy and anger. Thus probably arose much of the feeling which caused the awful atrocities of 1895.

It seemed a little candle which, through the consecrated wisdom of Dr. Hamlin, was lighted when Bebek Seminary, which was the predecessor of Robert College, was opened amid those millions of hostile Turks; but it has thrown its beams far and will throw them farther yet, and, like the fagots of Ridley and Latimer, they will "never be put out again." As Paul says of himself in the wonderful verses for the day, Dr. Hamlin had a stewardship intrusted to him, and brought himself under bondage to all, that he might gain the more.

Among the most heroic figures in the history of modern missions since the days of colossal William Carey, towers high that of this noble New Englander. The details of his life in Turkey indicate an almost unbroken succession of disappointments, dangers and trials. His wonderful mechanical skill, like that of John Geddie, the ingenious and consecrated missionary to the New Hebrides, was no unimportant assistance in the prosecution of his work. By his enemies it was used against him, but through his extraordinary facility in carpentry and metallurgy he undoubtedly raised funds, imparted instruction and created respect where a man less gifted in those departments would have failed outright. A distinguished missionary not long ago told a large congregation in this country that no matter how ardent might be the piety of any candidate for a foreign mission, he should not be sent unless he possessed also a considerable medical education, a fair knowledge of tools, and a general ability to use his hands in cooking, sewing and all household arts. The very similes used in the passages for this week's reading seem to foreshadow such advice as this.

Thus, in several secular and characteristic ways, this wise and patient missionary of the Lord, whose life held so much that was hard and bitter, yet whose fame is imperishable, teaches an impressive lesson for us all of cross-bearing and crown-winning.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belmont. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belmont. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger.

"TWELVE is the age, ye know, when they can git their papers to let them work in the mills—that is, if it's summer, vacation time," said Maggie's mother. "An' they looks out that 'tis summer, most generally, when they does git 'em! After that it don't count. They jest works, lots of 'em, summer or winter, school or no school."

"The age! Do you mean that they let mere children, twelve years old, work in those mills?"

For a moment Patty stared silently. Then she shook her head.

"I reckon mebbe ye don't know much about it," she said wearily. "They don't wait till they's twelve. They jest says they's twelve. Nellie Magoon's eleven, an' Bess is ten, an' Susie McDermont ain't but nine—but they's all twelve on the mill books. Sam's jest a-learnin' Maggie ter say she's twelve even now, an' the minute she's big enough ter work she will be twelve. It makes me jest sick; an' that's why I can't bear ter hear her say it."

Margaret shuddered. Her face lost a little of its radiant glow, and her hand trembled as she raised it to her head.

"You are right—I did not know," she said faintly. "There must me something that can be done. There must be. I will see."

And she did see. That night she once more followed her guardian into the little den off the library.

"It's business again," she began, smiling faintly; "and it's the mills. May I speak to you a moment?"

"Of course you may," cried the man, trying to make his voice so cordial that there should be visible in his manner no trace of his real dismay at her request. "What is it?"

Margaret did not answer at once. Her head drooped forward a little.

She had seated herself near the desk, and her left hand and arm rested along the edge of its smooth flat top. The man's gaze drifted from her face to the arm, the slender wrist and the tapering fingers so clearly outlined in all their fairness against the dark mahogany, and so plainly all unfitted for strife or struggle. With a sudden movement he leaned forward and covered the slim fingers with his own warm-clasping hand.

"Margaret, dear child, don't!" he begged. "It breaks my heart to see you like this. You are carrying the whole world on those two frail shoulders of yours."

"No, no, it's not the whole world at all," protested the girl. "It's only a wee small part of it—and such a defenseless little part, too. It's the children down at the mills."

Unconsciously the man straightened himself. His clasp on the outstretched hand loosened until Margaret, as if in answer to the stern determination of his face, drew her hand away and raised her head until her eyes met his unflinchingly.

"It is useless, of course, to pretend not to understand," he began stiffly. "I suppose that that altogether too officious young McGinnis has been asking your help for some of his pet schemes."

"On the contrary, Mr. McGinnis has not spoken to me of the mill workers," corrected Margaret, quietly, but with a curious little thrill that resolved itself into a silent exultation that there was then at least one at the mills on whose aid she might count. "I have not seen him, indeed, since that first morning I met him," she finished coldly. Though Margaret would not own it to herself, the fact that she had not seen the young man, Robert McGinnis, had surprised and disappointed her not a little. Margaret Kendall was not used to having her presence and her gracious invitations ignored.

"Oh, then you haven't seen him," murmured her guardian; and there was a curious intonation of relief in his voice. "Who, then, has been talking to you?"

"No one—in the way you mean. Patty inadvertently mentioned it today, and I questioned her. I was shocked and distressed. Those little children—just think of it—twelve years old, and working in the mills!"

The man made a troubled gesture.

"But, my dear Margaret, I did not put them there. Their parents did it."

"But you could refuse to take them."

"Why should I?" he shrugged. "They would merely go into some other man's mill."

"But you don't know the worst of it," moaned the girl. "They've lied to you. They aren't even twelve, some of them. They're babies of nine and ten!"

She paused expectantly, but he did not speak. He only turned his head so that she could not see his eyes.

"You did not know it, of course," she went on feverishly. "But you do now. And surely now, now you can do something."

Still he was silent. Then he turned sharply.

"Margaret, I beg of you to believe me when I say that you do not understand the matter at all. Those people are poor. They need the money. You would deprive some of the families of two-thirds of their means of support if you took away what the children earn. Help them, pity them, be as charitable as you like. That is well and good; but, Margaret, don't, for heaven's sake, let your heart run away with your head when it comes to the business part of it!"

"Business!—with babies nine years old!"

It has been said by a physician that most diseases are the result of indigestion.

There's undoubtedly much truth in the statement, even to the cause of many unsightly eruptions, which many suppose can be removed by applying some remedy on the outside.

By changing her food a Kan. girl was relieved of an eczema which was a great annoyance to her. She writes:

"For five months I was suffering with an eruption on my face and hands which our doctor called eczema and which caused me a great deal of inconvenience. The suffering was almost unbearable.

"The medicine I took only gave me temporary relief. One day I happened to read somewhere that eczema was caused by indigestion. Then I read that many persons had been relieved of indigestion by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I decided to try it. I liked the taste of the food and was particularly pleased to notice that my digestion was improving and that the eruption was disappearing as if by magic. I had at last found, in this great food, something that reached my trouble.

"When I find a victim of this affliction I remember my own former suffering and advise a trial of Grape-Nuts food instead of medicines." "There's a reason."

The man sprang to his feet and walked twice the length of the room; then he turned about and faced the scornful eyes of the girl by the desk. "Margaret, don't look at me as if you thought I was a fiend incarnate. I regret this sort of thing as much as you do. Indeed I do. But my hands are tied. I am simply a part of a great machine—a gigantic system—and must run my mills as other men do. Surely you must see that. Just think over, and give me credit at least for knowing a little more of the business than you do, when I and my father before me have been here as many years as you have days. Come, please don't let us talk of this thing any more to-night. You are tired and overwrought, and I don't think you realize yourself what you are asking."

"Very well, I will go," sighed Margaret, rising wearily to her feet. "But I can't forget it. There must be some way out of it—somehow—sometime."

CHAPTER XXVI

HERE came a day when there seemed to be nothing left to do for Patty. Maggie was well, and played again in the tiny yard. The yard itself was no longer strewn with tin cans and bits of paper, nor did the gate hang half-hinged in slovenly decrepitude. The house rejoiced in new paper, paint and window glass, and the roof showed a spotted surface that would defy the heaviest shower. Within, before a cheery fire, Patty sewed industriously on garments which Miss Kendall nowise needed, but for which Miss Kendall would pay much money.

Patty did not work in the mills now. Margaret had refused to let her go back, saying that she wanted lots of sewing done, and Patty could do that instead. Patty's own wardrobe, as well as that of the child Maggie, was supplied for a year ahead; and the pantry and the storeroom of the little house fairly groaned with good things to eat. Even Sam, true to Margaret's promise, was not "left out," as was shown by his appearance. Sam, stirred by the girl's cheery encouragement and cheerful confidence, held up his head sometimes now with a trace of his old manliness, and had even been known to keep sober for twelve whole hours at a time.

There did, indeed, seem nothing left to do for Patty, and Margaret found herself with the old idleness on her hands.

At Belcourt Mrs. Merideth and her brothers were doing everything in their power to make Margaret happy. They were frightened and dismayed at the girl's "infatuation for that mill woman," as they termed Margaret's interest in Patty; and they had ever before them the haunting vision of the girl's childhood morbidness, which they so feared to see return.

To the Spencers, happiness for Margaret meant pleasure, excitement, and—as Ned expressed it—"something doing." At the first hint, then, of leisure on the part of Margaret, these three vied with each other to fill that leisure to the brim.

Two or three guests were invited—just enough to break the monotony of the familiar faces, though not enough to spoil the intimacy and render outside interests easy. It was December, and too late for picnics; but it was yet early in the month, and driving and automobiling were still possible, and even enjoyable. The goal now was not a lake or a mountain, to be sure; but it might be a not too distant city, with a concert or a luncheon to give zest to the trip.

Ned, in particular, was indefatigable in his efforts to please; and Margaret could scarcely move that she did not find him at her elbow with some suggestion for her gratification ranging all the way from a dinner-party to a footstool.

Margaret was not quite at ease about Ned. There was an exclusiveness in his devotions and a tenderness in his ministrations that made her a little restless in his presence, particularly if she found herself alone with him. Ned was her good friend—her comrade. She was very sure that she did not wish him to be anything else; and if he should try to be—there would be an end to the comradeship, at all events, if not to the friendship.

DAVID SPARES SAUL'S LIFE

By MRS. M. BAXTER

DAVID'S life was full of trial, but it was full of glory, too, and without the trial there would not have been the glory. He was now at the head of a band of men who were not to be despised, and his faith was exercised daily for supplies, and daily he could sing his song of deliverance: "Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies" (Ps. 23: 5).

Saul heeded not what was right or just, whether David deserved to die or not; his very existence was an offense to Saul, because God was on his side; the only reason for seeking David's life was his jealousy; he wanted him to be slain. Saul speaks as though David were the aggressor, and himself the aggrieved party. "Blessed be ye of the Lord," he says; "for ye have compassion on me." Compassion! When they were abetting Saul in the slaughter of an innocent man!

Saul arranged with the men of Ziph that they should search out David's hiding-place. David got wind of Saul's pursuit of him and his men, and they came to such close quarters that Saul and his men were on one side of a mountain, and David and his on the other. It was a critical moment, but God remembered David, and an unexpected end was put to Saul's pursuit, or at that moment Saul heard that the Philistines had invaded the land.

No sooner was he returned from following the Philistines than it was told him, "Behold, David is in the wilderness of Engedi." Saul thought he would now make sure of him, and he took three thousand men with him, to conquer one-fifth their number, who were with David and with David's God. The king entered the mouth of a cave alone and unguarded, little knowing how near he was to the man whose life he sought; for David and his men were "in the sides of the cave." David's followers were urgent upon him to take the opportunity, which seemed to them to be God-given, to rid himself once for all of the king who sought his life. But David withheld his men from laying hands on Saul, and with wonderful dexterity "cut off the skirt of Saul's robe" while he lay unconscious in sleep.

And the king left the cave, the darkness hiding from him the disarrangement of his apparel. No sooner was he in the daylight than David followed him, holding the skirt of his robe, and saluting him with the words, "My lord the king, wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt? Behold, this day thine eyes have seen how that the Lord had delivered thee to-day into mine hand in the cave, and some bade me kill thee; but mine eye spared thee."

Saul said to David, "Thou art more righteous than I, for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." And he marveled that David could thus spare his enemy.

SELF DELUSION

Many People Deceived by Coffee

We like to defend our indulgencies and habits even though we may be convinced of their actual harmfulness.

A man can convince himself that whisky is good for him on a cold morning, or beer on a hot summer day—when he wants the whisky or beer.

It's the same with coffee. Thousands of people suffer headache and nervousness year after year but try to persuade themselves the cause is not coffee—because they like coffee.

"While yet a child I commenced using coffee and continued it," writes a Wis. man, "until I was a regular coffee fiend. I drank it every morning and in consequence had a blinding headache nearly every afternoon."

"My folks thought it was coffee that ailed me, but I liked it and would not admit it was the cause of my trouble, so I stuck to coffee and the headaches stuck to me."

"Finally, the folks stopped buying coffee and brought home some Postum. They made it right (directions on pkg.) and told me to see what difference it would make with my head, and during that first week on Postum my old affliction did not bother me once. From that day to this we have used nothing but Postum in place of coffee—headaches are a thing of the past and the whole family is in fine health."

"Postum looks good, smells good, tastes good, is good, and does good to the whole body." "There's a Reason."

Emin Bey, the Reformer

The Dolma-Bagtche Palace, Where the Turkish Parliament Will Meet

Izzet Pacha, the Sultan's Adviser

THE POLITICAL UPHEAVAL IN TURKEY

Sheik-ul-Islam

TURKEY, that country which the rest of the world had regarded as a State which had deliberately placed itself at one side of the line of march of progressive events and whose leaders and rulers seemed to have a chronic fear of change, has taken all by surprise by changing from an absolute monarchy to a constitutional monarchy. In fact, this surprise has been in great part shared by the Sultan himself, who had been kept in the dark as to the real significance of events in his empire, and to whom the extent of certain insurrections had been minimized by his ministers, who were actuated by the desire to hold their lucrative places at court and did not dare to tell the real facts. The Young Turkey party has worked up this revolt and its leaders are now in power. As a matter of fact, it may be said that Turkey has been a constitutional country for over thirty years, only very few people knew about it, and the government had no desire to spread the information. The constitution, however, had been carefully tucked away among the dusty state archives and was never thought of as a practical guide for carrying on the business of the country until recently. It was well framed and it has been accepted without much alteration by the reformers. The constitution of 1876 provided for a parliament of two chambers and for a month this legislative body was actually in existence. Then the war with Russia broke across the northern border and the parliament ceased to exist, its members were away in the army for the most part and when the war was over the Sultan was supreme.

A change, however, in the political atmosphere began to be noticed. Hundreds of young men of Turkey have been educated in recent years in schools in France, Germany, and other European countries, and they came home to compare the decaying condition of their native land with the prosperity and enlightenment of the countries in which they had been educated. These men formed with other discontented Turks at home the "Young Turkey Party of Union and Progress." Many of the younger officers in the army became affiliated with it. Turkish officers who had been educated abroad were objects of suspicion to their watchful government and were sent to posts where they would see little active service.

The army heretofore has been the devoted, unreasoning servant of Abdul Hamid. It marched without a murmur and under conditions of great hardship to execute his least commands. Patience was perhaps its most notable characteristic next to its religious and intolerant fanaticism when called upon to attack those of an opposing faith. "Hitherto," says one writer, "whatever else might fail him, the army has never failed." But for a long while they were not paid and there was small prospect that they would be unless some outburst should occur. Revolts were reported here and there this summer and at last the troops in Macedonia were in open mutiny.

The headquarters of the "Young Turks" is at Monastir. Part of the Third Army Corps is stationed there, and the officers threatened to shoot all of the generals in Macedonia, after they shot Osman Hidyet, and then march the army from Monastir to Constantinople, a distance of four hundred miles, unless the constitution was re-established. The Revolutionary Committee assumed the duties of a regular government at Monastir, a place of about 40,000 inhabitants. It was not necessary for them to carry out their threat to march on the capital of the Sultan. A telegram came to the palace in Constantinople from some of the formerly faithful Albanians demanding the constitution. This was the last straw. The Sultan took the oath on the Koran before the Sheik-ul-Islam to restore the constitution.

Most of the Sultan's former ministers were placed under arrest. Izzet Pacha, the ruler's closest adviser, who is said to have kept him in the dark as regards the progress of the revolt against his authority, became a fugitive. It was reported that he escaped to America. The Sultan has given a palace for a parliament building and the money for the construction of a new one later on. Said Pacha, the new Grand Vizier, has held the office six times and has the respect of the nation. Emin Bey, the reformer, lost favor with the Sultan, whose adviser he had been, because he urged important reforms.

Several leaders of the Young Turkey party have been given prominent positions in the government and ambassadors in sympathy with the new state of affairs will probably be appointed to represent Turkey at the capitals of foreign nations. The Turkish minister to the United States, a son of Izzet Pacha, has been recalled, and the Turkish Consul-General at New York has been given temporary charge of the legation in Washington. Syrians and Armenians are now hopeful of a change for the better in their condition, a change that most of them had despaired of, but which now seems near in the new day which is breaking in the East.

A SERMON BY

THE INNER REVELATION

TEXT:

"It pleased God . . . to reveal His Son in me, that I might preach Him."—Galatians 1: 15-16.

THERE is always fascination in those portions of Scripture which represent God as being moved by feeling. The passage here indicates that the Infinite is touched by an impulse akin to our human delight. "It pleased God." Though the verb so translated may not have the full meaning of rejoicing, it does connect that idea with the statement of God's decision, while other references tell us plainly that the Almighty may feel the thrill of pleasure. A man must stand near the gate into the divine kingdom when he really believes that the Lord is not indifferent, that he is affected by sorrow or joy over our choices, that the deeds of men are registered in the emotions of God. One cannot fail to note in the Bible the frequency of the assurance that something has "pleased" God. And from this language we get the lesson that we are not dealing with frigidity, or with a blank, or with a vast insensibility. Our conduct finds an instant response in the Infinite Spirit. In a deep sense, he himself is the record of our lives. His own heart is the book of judgment. The impressions of pleasure or displeasure that we have written upon the sensitive tablets of that heart tell infallibly the story of our lives. All that will be needed at last for our condemnation or for our justification will be the unsealing of the Lord's heart and the open array of effects made there by us. The deeds done in the human body make an indelible copy in the Divine Spirit.

Pleasing God

Nor does it require deep thinking, after once we have gotten this view, to see how practical and persuasive it is. Often we repeat the phrase "please God," but we are apt to construe the feeling of divine pleasure as exceptional and inhuman. We do not get the conviction that the word "please" must keep much of its usual meaning, and that, if we are to modify its definition at all when we apply it to God, we are only to free it from its superficial sense and fill it with the idea of the purest and most exalted joy. For the capacity of pleasure, like the capacity of pain, increases as we pass to the higher ranges of being. The polyp has life; but its life is low in form, and it can neither suffer nor enjoy much. The oyster has life; but its life is not complex and delicate, and it has room for the merest portion of pleasure or of pain. But, as we move up, we find the power of feeling enlarging. A fine-grained man both suffers more and enjoys more than his dull and heavy neighbor. It is therefore more painful to thrust a knife into his feelings; and, also, more worth while, so far as one act is concerned, to bring him real gladness. If, then, the capacity of feeling increases as we ascend the grades of life, what must be its possibility in God himself? We have not time, and probably not the ability, to follow this thought into some of its deepest meanings and mysteries; it is enough now to point out its practical bearing. God can be "pleased." Being highest in being, he can be most pleased. It would be well, both for the sake of our restraint and for the sake of our inspiration, to remember that God's feelings answer to our conduct. His pleasure is deepest when we allow him to do for us the deepest thing. No marvel is it, then, that Paul wrote: "It pleased God . . . to reveal his Son in me." Nothing that had ever come into the varied experience of the Tarsus Pharisee had pleased God so much as the right to make this great revelation to his great child.

So much may be said as to the inspiration of this revelation: it was nothing less than the good pleasure of God—the real joy of the Father in doing the best thing for his mistaken child. We will think for a few moments of the subject of the revelation. This was nothing other than "His Son." The revelation did not consist in a creed about Jesus Christ; it was not made up of a statement of his divine offices and of his relation to God and to men; it was rather a revelation of Christ himself: "It pleased God to reveal his Son in me." The safest doctrine about Christ grows out of the closest relation to Christ. The revelation about his nature is best given in the presence of his grace and helpfulness. So it is not said that "it pleased God to reveal the truth about his Son in me"; for Christ within is his own witness. The best way to get a faith or creed about a man is to live with him, to catch the power of his spirit, to feel resolution quicken under the sway of his courage, to see evil impulses fly at the coming of his closer influence. And the best creed or faith that we can ever get about Christ will be in the deepening and purifying of the spiritual life that comes from his presence within, until he is not simply the hope of glory hereafter, but the hope of glory in character now.

This revelation of his son is the supreme revelation of God himself. It is the uppermost revealing of him who is revealed somewhat in all his world. The truth is that all life is so made as to show God to the understanding soul. All laws which men discover and state are merely the revealing of God's ways of doing things; for a law apart from one who gives it is as unthinkable as a thought without one who thinks. Every color that is written on the clouds, the blue of the clearest day, the purple and gold of the finest sunset; every flash of light from the stars of heaven, with the moon floating upon the upper ocean; every flower that charms with its crimson or pink or scarlet or white; all these are the revelations of the beauty of the Lord our God. The mountains with their incomprehensible weights pushed up into the very skies; the seas lying in their hollows and thrust by the movement of the divine hand against all shores; the planets hung in mid-space by the word of the Almighty and held ever in their sure courses around the sun—all these are the revealings of the power of the Lord our God.

But the heart of God—the love of the Father for his children—is never revealed until we see it in Jesus the Son. In reality the earth is a huge school; all men are pupils, quick or dull; and all the lessons centre in the one word—God. But in that school there is a highest department where men learn the deepest and truest lesson about Him—the school where Christ becomes the subject of revelation. No man ever really knows the Father until it has "pleased God to reveal his Son." There is a phrase in the close of one of Paul's chapters that is full of meaning—"the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." From the love of God which is in the world men seem to be easily separated. Life with its manifold calls separates them from it; things present with their problems and things to come with their mysteries separate them from it; and death, with its resistless call to every human being to close his eyes to the revelation of God's love in the world, seems to separate from it. But when God reveals his Son in the human heart life is seen as a gift of the Father; principalities become the creations and conveniences of his day; things present are alleviated by the divine grace, and things to come are illuminated by the divine promise; death itself becomes only the door into the nearer presence of God. No wonder is it, then, that he who wrote this verse about the pleasure of God in revealing his Son should also have written his ecstatic trust in these words: "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The Revelation of the Son

Now, having noted the source and the subject of the revelation, we pass on to speak of its spirituality. "It pleased God to reveal his Son in me," the apostle writes. It was an inner revelation. Being an inner revelation, it was a spiritual revelation; for only the spiritual can be revealed to the spiritual that is within. We are all inclined to get lost, even in the religious life, in a sort of materialism. We should like to see letters written on the sky. We should be glad if we should behold the earth bathed in the light whose brightness was never before seen on sea or land. We should be impressed and led to deeper faith, as we think, if we could have audible voices sounding into our ears and penetrating with conviction to our souls. We crave that type of religious experience which makes a physical show. We envy those who tell that they have had sensuous evidence of the revelation of Christ and his forgiving grace. Like a certain other generation in the time of our Lord's earthly life, we are always seeking for a sign; and it is probably true that Christ gives us nothing outward save only his death and resurrection as reported to us by the trusty witnesses of long ago. If God has given lower evidence to any soul, we will not quarrel with that soul; we will be glad with him. But we must insist that, if this revelation is to be true, it must be inward. Letters on the sky will not do unless they are written also on the heart. Bright lights will not illumine unless they shed their radiance on the spirit. Audible voices will not instruct unless they are heard the secret chambers of the soul. The true religious experience is that which, whatever may be its accompaniments, comes back at last to the inward evidence and says confidently: "It pleased God reveal his Son in me."

Christ Revealed in the Heart

It must often occur to us that many who were given the outward revelation of Christ failed to have Christ revealed in them. How many saw him as he spoke a yet did not get his real message? How many saw him when he brought from the invisible storehouse of loaves and fishes and yet did not get the real conception of his power? How many saw him as he was hanging on the cross and yet did not get the real lesson of his love? The Calvary hill was thronged with men who saw outwardly the infinite sacrifice and who took it simply as a tragic part of their great holiday. Christ was revealed to them but he was not revealed in them. This shows that the revelation must be inward if it is to be effective. There must be a Bethlehem with a divine birth in the soul. There must be a cross lifted up in the heart and giving the inner vision of the love which was unto death. There must be a morning of resurrection in the calendar of the innermost life. A brief poem by Edwin Markham is not so well known as his "Man With the Hoe," but it is by far more true and radical:

O friend, we never choose the better part,
Until we set the cross up in the heart.
I know I can not live until I die—
Till I am nailed upon it wild and high,
And sleep in the tomb for a full three days dead,
With angels at the foot and at the head.
But then in a great brightness I shall rise
To walk with stiller feet below the skies.

This is the very perfection of Christ's revealing; it is even his spirit moving in upon the spirit of man and fashioning it anew after the image of the Lord who created it and gave it life.

It is surely suggestive that in this finest work concerning his coming into the Christian life, Paul omits all mention of outward features. These he tells elsewhere. But now, when he would relate only the essential things, he says nothing of the merest external accompaniments of his conversion. Christ had been revealed to him in a marked way; it is easily the most dramatic experience of the New Testament. The light that shone above him was beyond the brightness of the sun. There was an audible voice coming out of the clouds. The man struck prone and blind upon the Damascus way certainly had Christ revealed to him. But the revelation was deeper than that: Christ was also revealed in him. The real heart of the vision of Paul comes to every man who yields to Christ. It is not likely to have the same spectacular features; but it must have the same innermost reality. It is good and comforting to find that when Paul would convince the Galatians of the validity of his Christian faith and life, he did not appeal to the outward revelation, gorgeous and overpowering as that was. He appealed rather to the inner fact: that the Son was revealed in him until at last he could say: "I live, yet not I; but Christ liveth in me."

How natural all this is, and how much in accord with the way one human spirit would aid another human spirit! The purpose of one who stands to instruct in religious things is not to give any outward revealing of the truth of his own life, but merely to make it real and vital in the hearts of his hearers. He can only be glad if men shall lose all consciousness of his gesture, all consciousness of his tones, all consciousness of his appearance, if so be that the truth of what he says shall find its way within and be revealed to the very soul. We help men most by bringing our strong spirits to the aid of their weak spirits and by so building them within that they go out to be strong and brave and true. It is just so that Christ must aid us. His power must come into our spiritual weakness; his courage must drive out our despondency; his purity must overcome our sin. All this is inner work. Jesus is to be revealed "in" us. Until he comes within, vain is the revelation. The scales must fall from the soul's eyes. Does not this suggest the very trouble with islands means everything good and kindly. It means welcome, a whole heartfelt of love and good wishes; it also means "that good old word good-by," and our sailor boys had it all from beginning to end of their stay.

THE WHITE FLEET AT HAWAII

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

The Officers Had a Good Time

Nor was Jack the only one who was welcomed to Honolulu. The moment I stepped upon Oahu's shores I felt at home. So must many others have felt, for it is a central point where peoples of the world have congregated. Oahu's foreign population far exceeds her native. Among her 60,000 inhabitants, over 14,000 are Japanese and 11,000 are Chinese. The island is a paradise for foreigners, and threatens to become Oriental in character. Coming, as I did, from China and Japan, it looked very odd to see Orientals adopting American or Hawaiian ways, wearing hats (although the sun is far less scorching than in their own land), driving about in carriages or galloping by on horseback; and it is all so different from their life in their homeland that they do not look half so picturesque in the new setting.

Before the overthrow of the government (that is what they say here) a Chinaman could not become a resident of the islands unless he married a native woman. This he was generally willing to do, and the women were nothing loath to take a Chinese husband, for the Chinese are kind to wife and children. The children of such marriages are filling responsible positions and the younger ones are carrying off the prizes in government schools. The Chinese make

The U. S. Battleship "Missouri" at Honolulu

HER brow ever fanned by soft breezes and her face turned towards the sea, Honolulu, the beautiful, smiled upon the White Fleet as it rode into her waters. Their stay here was a red-letter week for the city, which was made gay with lighting and other decorations. Hospitality reigned supreme and Uncle Sam's boys were given the freedom of the town. Both officers and men seemed to heartily enjoy the amusements provided for them. The Blue Jackets won golden opinions and that a set of sailors would be hard to find was the expression heard on all sides, as they marched 2,400 strong through the streets of the Hawaiian capital.

It was noticed that their time was spent in seeing the best and most instructive that the islands offer. The greatest sight of all is the volcano at Hilo on Hawaii. Just now it is in an unusual state of activity, flames bursting forth and molten lava pouring down its sides. Hundreds visited it, but many were content to climb to the "Punch Bowl" (on the crater of an extinct volcano) and to Pali Oahu's historic peak) for views of rock and sea. At the Bishop Museum, men in white and blue, with badges of mourning on their sleeves, lingered before the glass cases, and at the Aquarium hung entranced over the great tanks that hold the brilliant and curious fishes that belong to Hawaiian waters.

The bathing and surf riding on plank or in a canoe were pastimes quite after Jack's own heart. Many of them tried horseback riding—they always do when in port—and some came to grief. One such, whose picture I took, had cut his trousers across the knee and a wound showed beneath. "This animal is no good," he said, and then, dropping unconsciously into nautical parlance, "you can't steer her at all. I expect she'll land me on the rocks before I get her back to the stable. Seems to me she must be blind. She ran me into a street car, and now just see how I look to go back to the ship," and he tugged at the reins as if he were hoisting sail and in a way that was likely to prove perilous to somebody. "Aloha" is a word which in the language of the admirable citizens and agriculturists, but are not ambitious; while the Japanese, on the contrary, push forward and are ready to compete with the white population. They are not only competitive, but restless also, and always looking for advancement. They are getting the best places and property interests in Honolulu, and the natives are dying out. Americans come, but do not stay.

Hawaiians are natural musicians. Their music shows to best advantage in their own melodies, which are full of pathos and feeling. Their voices, like those of our negroes, have a timbre that reaches the heart. They sing as they dance or play what we term "band music," and their voices blend with native instruments. The band players are said to be short lived.

Just now, the important question that presents itself is the straightening of the channel and the developing of Pearl Harbor. With this and the completion of the Panama Canal, America will eventually have a rich possession in Hawaii.

I had an introduction to Governor Frear, and in speaking of the luxuriant semi-tropical growth that makes one feel upon reaching Honolulu that it is indeed an enchanted isle with the freshness of perennial spring clothing its shores, I was surprised when the Governor said: "But this is not natural. Thirty years ago it was a barren waste; all this is the result of irrigation." We were sitting upon the broad lanai of the Governor's house and he was advising me to visit the volcano, the extensive pineapple fields and the sugar mills.

Afterwards he asked me if I should like to see his house, which is a new one, but recently finished. I had already seen the house where the Governor and his wife formerly lived, but which had proved too small for the social functions they were called upon to give. As we entered the door which opened into the large hall or living-room, the Governor said: "We are always at home, during the season, on Mondays, and even this large room is often well filled. The wood-work is the native koa, which polishes like mahogany. We speak of it here as the Hawaiian mahogany. Here is a fire-place, not large, but the only one in Honolulu."

There were handsome settles built in this reception hall which, with the dining-room, occupied the entire front of the mansion. There was the greatest simplicity in the furnishings of these rooms and of the library at the back (the only other room I saw). The Governor is a man of quiet and dignified manner. He drew my attention to some chairs which he told me had belonged to Mrs. Frear's grandmother, Mrs. Smith, one of the early missionaries to the Hawaiian Islands.

some of us now? We want Christ to be revealed to us; but we are not quite willing to have him revealed in us. We ask for the message that does not require surrender. But Christ is never revealed within unless he becomes the king within. When he inhabits the heart at all he always sits upon its throne and rules with firm love. So we say to the preacher: Reveal Christ to us; tell us about his goodness and his power; tell us even how we are to do right; give us his assurance of the love of God. But when the preacher says: "Open your heart; let Christ be revealed in you; surrender now to the call of love and holiness and sacrifice that he has already spoken to your heart"—then we begin to shrink from the revelation. The difference between the nominal Christian and the vital Christian lies just here: Christ has been revealed to the one; he has been revealed in the other. This hour Christ is revealed to us all; will we let him be revealed in us, so that our deepest life may answer to his command and our deepest longing be met in his love?

This is the real blessing. It was even the blessing pronounced upon Peter when he made his memorable confession of the Master at Caesarea Philippi. The Lord had asked at length, after the apostle had been giving hear-say evidence: "Who say ye that I am?" Peter had replied: "We say that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Immediately Christ pronounced a blessing upon his apostle. He did not say that he should be blessed; he rather said that he was already blessed. And why? Because he had gotten the deep revelation of spirit! "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee." That was to say: "The revelation that has come to you is a spiritual revelation. You have not gotten it by simply looking upon my flesh and blood. You have gotten it because my spirit has laid hold upon your spirit. The witness has gotten within you." It is no venture to say that the best blessing of the Master is still pronounced upon those who get the inner revelation of his sonship and who respond to it in confession and surrender.

One word should be said about the purpose of the revelation. We have spoken of its inspiration in the good pleasure of God; of its subject in the person of "his Son"; of its spirituality in its being revealed within. It remains for us to ask: Why did God give this revelation? Was it that Paul might hide it in his heart and keep it there as a precious treasure?

Was it alone that the apostle might grow into its assurance and rest himself in his trust? All that, probably; but much more! Paul gives the purpose of the revelation: "It pleased God to reveal his Son in me that I might preach him." Is that not always the purpose of this revelation? Would God reveal in us One who gave himself for us in order that we might keep him to ourselves? The word "preach" here is not used in any professional or special sense; it simply means the telling of the good news of God as shown in Christ. The message is revealed within that it may be told without. The flower gets its beauty and fragrance that it may display and shed them. The brook gets its water from spring and rivulet that it may empty it and still receive evermore. So God gives to his children the revelation of his Son in order that they may preach him. Let us not thwart the very purpose of God in showing to our hearts the grace of his Son. The water of life is ours to give; the bread of life is ours to distribute; and we never come to the Lord's purpose in his inward revelation until, whether we be ministers or laymen, we say each for himself: "It pleased God to reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him."

Korean Gentleman in Mourning

TO THE Occidental who has been initiated into the vagaries of the Korean wardrobe, a crowded Korean street, with its shimmering mass of dignified figures clad in silken robes of many colors and high horse-hair hats, is a place of unusual interest. The majority of the women seem to have grabbed their husband's green coats and hastily flung them over their heads, so as to hide the face almost completely. No, closer inspection shows that the space between the shoulders is only wide enough to cover the top of the head, and one is told that this coat, with the useless sleeves dangling from the sides of the head, is national among the Korean women of the middle class in many of the principal cities of the empire. There is a woman with a white coat flung over her head. She is from the country, and therefore does not wear the green of the city women. The women wear bungly skirts over wide, baggy trousers tied in at the ankles. Those women with no semi-coat thrown over their shoulders and displaying a hiatus between the skirt top and the short jacket are no doubt slave women of the lower class, for no others will appear in the street with their faces unveiled. This man in the shimmering robe of pale blue silk, and his companion in one of gray, is no doubt a gentleman of the yangban, or higher class. Their dignified walk, high and delicate hands, all proclaim the Korean gentleman of class—the dude of the Far East. This bare-legged fellow wearing a huge straw hat two feet in diameter and slashed with four black hawk feathers, is a farmer from the interior, as his garb proclaims; and this solemn gentleman clothed from head to foot in an olive-colored lawn cloth and wearing a large hat, somewhat on the order of the farmer's but made from a better quality of straw, and without the black hawk feathers, is a mourner. He also constantly carries a peculiar cloth fan in front of his face, or the lower part of it, this peculiar dress signifying that either his mother or father has died within a short time. He is considered a prisoner or victim of God, and, being such, cannot see the deity or show his face, which accounts for the huge hat and peculiar fan. The majority of the people on the street seem to be wearing white, which is the "business serge" of the Hermit Kingdom, and the man wearing the long white coat, tied close under the armpits, is correct in every detail of dress, according to Korean ideals. The two little children, whose clothes glimmer with a dozen or so brilliant colors, are out in their "Sunday best." The child to the right is a girl and the one to the left a boy—you can tell by their caps. The Korean women wear small red caps like worn by the little girl. The women most entirely hidden beneath the straw hats no doubt come from Ping Yang, the old capital of Korea, for style of hat is peculiar to the women of that city. It is very useful during inclement weather. Some of the Ping Yang men wear these hats during the rainy season on account of protection given. Truly, "dress makes the man" in the Hermit Kingdom, for one may take the Korean's dress as an accurate and ever-ready index to his home city, station in life and handicraft—all comes out in the dress.

Curious Basket-Hats of the Women of Ping Yang, Korea

A WOMAN ON THE "BIG HAT" MANIA

DEAR EDITOR: May I, through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, venture a few remarks and suggestions on the "eternal hat question"? No part of a woman's dress touches her heart more closely than her hat, so, possessing all a woman's natural weakness in this direction, I can speak feelingly on the matter. However, possessing also a normal sense of humor, certain features of the present styles in millinery lead me to attempt a brief comment on even so difficult a subject. For, whereas every question is admitted to have two sides, this particular problem has at least four, while it not infrequently makes all the difference in the world which side your viewpoint is from.

For example: One of the season's exaggerations, measuring some twenty-two inches in diameter by sixty or more in circumference, and tilted at an angle of at least thirty-five degrees, may appear charming enough as a frame for a pretty face providing you sit opposite it—better still if the wearer is in the seat or the pew behind. But let it be your misfortune to sit behind the hat, and the fairest face in all Christendom will not suffice to soothe your irritated feelings, when, after a vain struggle to see above, below, to the right and around the left brim, you are forced to give up in despair and endeavor to see your pastor, or the speaker or artist, as the case may be, through the eyes of your soul—a spiritual but most unsatisfactory expedient.

Scan the assembled women at church or at a public gathering; watch the towering heads of the procession as they file in. That sweet-faced, demure-looking little woman over there with a hat that might have been designed by the architect of the Singer building to judge by its proportions, calmly displays more cool nerve, as she walks up the aisle and takes her seat in front, than three men combined would dare to. Fashions, like caviar, may be an acquired taste, but again, like olives, it seldom takes more than a few attempts to "get used to them," a little persuasion from our friends, and we fairly delight in our conversion.

Being among the first to parade into church with a "merry widow," I feel that I am not without blame; but I do say that any woman who can deliberately be guilty of a like offense a second or third time, is surely oblivious to the Golden Rule. When the pastor speaks (whom she has come quite as much to see as to hear, though she may not be honest enough to admit it), let her sit in one of the rear pews and, while her view may be cut off from the object of her attention, her eyes will at least be opened to one of the follies of her sex.

Seriously speaking, ought there not to be a church hat? A suitable hat for church, concerts and like occasions, just as men have the "opera hat" for evening affairs? A hat not to exceed nine inches across the brim and to be trimmed flat. A hat adopted by unanimous agreement by a few thousand of our people—by the women readers of this paper, let us say—women who have the courage of their convictions—and the good example set would, I believe, be followed by thousands of others the country over. Or, as an alternative, let us institute the practice of taking off our hats before the sermon. Surely the minister should be given a fair chance and allowed to be the centre of all eyes for his allotted time at least. Under existing conditions this is clearly impossible. The Los Angeles clergyman who requests the women of his congregation every week to "please remove their hats before the beginning of the sermon, out of Christian consideration for others," deserves credit. He is a brave man. Others may take courage from his example and make similar requests.

Then, too, from a logical standpoint, what business have we as a body of Christian women in a highly civilized generation to parade into a Christian church trailing with us such unmistakable evidences of a barbarous custom? "Barbarous"? Why to be sure! In every uncivilized or partly civilized country the world over, and in all ages of history, woman has decorated her hair with—well, with almost anything and everything that she could appropriate for this particular vanity. We of to-day first order a straw or felt or silk contrivance and stick our ornaments on that—the great advantage being that the larger surface affords broader opportunity for display, and we are thus able to carry a greater quantity and variety of decorations. The tribeswoman sticks feathers in her hair; so, practically speaking, do we. She twines colored beads and glass ornaments in her tresses; we prefer jeweled hatpins. She makes similar use of bits of brass and metal; we resort to buckles and fancy buttons. She wears the skins and heads and tails and breasts of birds; these, too, with us are quite "the rage." She belongs to an unenlightened country where "women are made for men"; we belong—but no! the thought is too humiliating.

our self-respect than to look over collection of kodak pictures or photographs taken ten or fifteen years ago—far enough back at least so that the styles were radically different from those prevailing to-day. You will surely find some absurdity in the millinery line that will fairly take the breath away—"to think that you ever could have been guilty"—and evoke sigh for "John," or "George," or "poor father" who paid the bill. The lamentable part of it is that at the time you thought it a "perfect darling" or "dream."

But to return to the question. Should there not be a church hat? Is there no survival of the fittest that we can adopt and, putting all others aside, cleave only unto this? Why not go back to the pretty flower toques of a few years ago, that were close-fitting, trimmed flat and almost invariably becoming? Then let the first woman who dares to thrust a spray of leaves or a big rose high above the rest of the foliage be forthwith requested to take leave of absence until such time as she is ready to conform to prescribed regulations.

For my own part, I confess I love hats. I hate to "kindly remove them." I love the sense of security and peace of mind that comes from knowing that unruly short locks are safely confined by a veil. Still, my sympathies are with the clergy and the congregation as a whole. I will cheerfully sacrifice personal pride in the good of the cause if other women will join me.

HIS ANNUAL VISIT TO MONT-LAWN

FEEL sure that the many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the host of noble contributors toward the support of the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn will be glad to hear, from a friend of this great work, the impressions of a single day. I have watched the development of Mont-Lawn with great interest and rejoice with all who are so fortunate as to visit the Children's Paradise. The usual visit to Mont-Lawn is made from Nyack; but I chose this summer to come by the West Shore Railroad to Valley Cottage, and to walk over the summit of the Palisades, about a mile, to find everything in readiness for the usual Saturday dinner and play at the Home.

The signal of one bell from the Matron, Mrs. Hopkins, brought the children to their places in line in the path from the Homestead to Fort Plenty. Two bells were given as a signal for the boys who were in front of the line to step aside two paces. Three bells signaled the girls to proceed to the great dining hall, between the lines of boys. Then, the girls followed by the boys in double file, all the little folks marched to the tables, where a bountiful dinner was served.

After the children had their dinner, I lunched with the Matron and her assistants, the teachers who have charge of the children in their cottage dormitories. I am sure the children committed to their care can only learn good. The worshipful song of blessing before the meal was indeed impressive, both at the children's dinner and the teachers'.

Before the children had left the big dining hall, a New York City boy, Alexander Swartz, who is one of those enjoying the benefits of a ten days' outing at Mont-Lawn, asked the privilege of announcing a match ball game between the Tibbals Cottage ball nine, of which he was captain, and the nine from Sunshine Cottage. Mr. Arthur W. Little, a publisher of New York City, who was present as a visitor, was chosen to umpire the game;

so, after the Chapel service and the bean game and races, the two nines proceeded to the ball field, where the national game was played amid much enthusiasm, and the Sunbeam Cottage nine stood highest when the game was discontinued.

I must say that the chapel services are indeed a happy combination of patriotism and religion. The Misses Grandfield, who direct the musical instruction of the children, have rearranged the music and the service grandly impressive to children and visitors also.

Those who have so graciously supported this work all these years, I am sure will be glad to hear of the new as well as the old exercises and enjoyments at Mont-Lawn. I noticed some little boys sliding down the new toboggan slides of polished oak, taking great delight in an imaginary winter sport on a summer day. The brook under the old apple tree is a great success. An artificial stream thirty inches wide by six inches deep in a pebble and concrete channel, affords no end of delight to the children, who love to wade in the shallow water. New and spacious awnings on the eastern opening of the dining hall of Fort Plenty keep out the morning sunshine at breakfast time, while the children are eating in this open, breezy dining hall. The entertainment possible on a rainy day in the great hall above is "just great," as the children say, when they get on the roller skates, or gather for marches and drills when it is too wet to play on the lawn. It is a heart tonic to watch the children play in the great pile of snow-white sand which constitutes "the beach" at Mont-Lawn. Order prevails everywhere; yet there is variety sufficient to please all the children.

I heard one of the teachers remark, incidentally, that in a recent ramble through the woods with fifty-four children, watched by two teachers, each child gathered from a pint to a quart of huckleberries, besides the nature study of that hour's walk. Sometimes a morning walk of five miles is taken away from the Home. The teachers endeavor to carry out the best ideals of this noble Fresh Air work. I enclose a small check of $3 to give some child an outing of ten days, and I shall urge our Sunday School at the North Baptist Church in New York City to place your institution on its list for regular contributions.

Bible verses used in former years. That chapel service of August 8 will be long remembered by all who were present. In my own talk to the children, I could only express one word, and that was congratulation. The worshipful atmosphere of the chapel and the decorations of flags combine to make

LONG PAST THE CENTURY MARK

IN THESE days of advanced hygiene, and with scientific methods of combating disease increasing on every hand, it is interesting to know something of the lives of men and women who have long passed the "allotted span." We give below a brief sketch of several notable cases of this class:

Mrs. Esther Davis, who is known as the oldest woman in New York, is of Jewish descent, and was born in Russia in 1794. She has been a resident of this country for about twenty-five years. At one time she was very wealthy; but reverses came and reduced her to poverty. She has been a member of the Daughters of Jacob Home for Aged People at 302 East Broadway, New York, for several years. She has outlived her four children and her only grandchild, so that she is now alone in the world. Her mind is still clear and active.

In the same Home resides another centenarian, Mrs. Rose Arenwald, 107 years old. A few years ago, a third centenarian lady kept them company, but she died at the age of 109. All three of these remarkable women were of Russian birth, and their extraordinary longevity gives force to the proverb that there is iron in the Russian air.

Other Centenarians

Among other authenticated cases of women who have passed the century mark are Mrs. Anna Miskus, of Chicago, who died on August 1 of this year at the age of 107 years. When a girl, at her home in Poland, she took a vow never to worry, and to this she attributed her long life. She had forty grandchildren at the time of her death. She was a prominent settlement worker in Chicago. Last January there died at Hillsboro, Ore., Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, a Tennessee lady, whom the Bible records showed to be 120 years of age. She was a member of the Methodist Church for more than a century, and was probably the oldest woman in America. Her mother lived to the age of 110. Mrs. Annie Campbell, of Glasgow, Scotland, is nearing her 111th year, and is said to be the oldest woman in Scotland. She has traveled in a railway train only once, and has never worn spectacles or tasted medicine. Mrs. Catherine Downie, of Patrick, Scotland, is in her 106th year; and Mrs. Donald White, of Sandbank, Scotland, is 104. Mr. James Grieve, shepherd at Mark, on the Ardgool estate, Scotland, is 107 years of age.

A Lifetime of Christian Work

On September 26, Mrs. A. M. Felt will be eighty-nine years old. She comes of good old Moravian herself useful in almost every capacity in which a woman is allowed to work in the church, and always without pay. She has been a deaconess, a Sunday School teacher, the treasurer of the Woman's Missionary Society, collector of the Mite Society, and teacher of a Saturday Afternoon Sewing School. In this she taught not only sewing and the related branches of knitting and crocheting, but also gave lessons in German, in manners, in religion, and all matters of general information.

Then she devoted herself to the business of making rugs, in which she is still greatly interested. Her fame as a rug maker has spread far and wide, for the products of her skill are veritable works of art in many different designs and very beautiful.

Mrs. Felt retains in all its fervor her interest in her beloved church. Especially is she just now absorbed in a plan to build a home for its aged women.

Mrs. Felt expects to be the first inmate of this home. Unfortunately, no endowment is forthcoming for it, though the good sisters are working heroically to raise money. Mrs. Felt has made many rugs for this worthy object.

Ninety-Eight and Never Was Sick

Another interesting Christian who is still hale and useful in the sunset of life is Mr. Harvey Brewer, of Greenwich, N. Y., who has recently celebrated his 98th birthday by visiting his son and other friends at Cambridge, N. Y. Mr. Brewer is still straight and broad-shouldered, has never been sick in bed in his life, and has never worn glasses. He lives with his two daughters, Mrs. Ball and Miss Brewer. For many years he drove a team from Greenwich to Bennington, drawing tow for making wadding. Probably those long days in the open air have been no small element in promoting his health and longevity. Mr. Brewer has been for many years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and walks a mile to the postoffice to get it every week when it becomes due.

stock and is the eldest native of her sex in Lititz, Pa., where she was educated, graduating from Linden Hall Seminary, a famous old Moravian school for girls. She taught here for more than twelve years, and many of the older alumnae still remember her by her maiden name and speak affectionately of their old teacher, "Miss Addie Grider." She was married in 1851 to the Rev. John Frederick Felt, a Moravian clergyman, and spent twelve years in Wisconsin, doing pioneer missionary work with him.

In 1863, her husband, having become very deaf, was obliged to retire from his work, and they returned to Lititz, where he died eighteen years later. During this time and ever since Mrs. Felt has made

Our White Fleet and Japan

AUSTRALIA and New Zealand have given our "White Fleet" a rousing welcome and farewell, and the battleships are now on their way to Japan. There a reception awaits our officers and men which promises to be a marvel of lavish Eastern hospitality. Half a million dollars will be expended in receptions, entertainments and souvenirs. All the indications point to a season of good-fellowship and social intercourse, which cannot fail to cement still more strongly the bonds of friendship that now exist between Japan and ourselves.

It is reasonable to expect that the Mikado's navy will make a brave showing, to impress the visitors with the strength and efficiency of the sea forces of the island empire. There will be ample opportunity, no doubt, for comparison of warships and naval methods; but we believe that all will be done in such a friendly, courteous and agreeable way that there can be no straining of relations on that account. Ex-Premier Okuma, formerly a powerful politician, but now a private Japanese citizen, has been endeavoring lately to create feeling between the two nations, but he has not succeeded. Once a popular idol, Okuma seems in his old age to have become splenetic, and, like some of our own jingoes, something of a trouble-breeder. So long as we have unscrupulous jingoes of our own, who seem to desire nothing so much as to embroil this country in a quarrel with a friendly power, we cannot afford to criticize harshly the jingoes of Japan. But we believe the experience of our naval force in the Far East will be agreeable on the whole, and that they will come back full of pleasant recollections and with a high opinion of Japanese hospitality.

The Opening of Tibet

TILL now Tibet has been literally a "Sealed Land," its doors closed to all outside influences, and its millions of population have remained in heathen darkness, while practically every country around it has been receiving the Gospel. But a new day has dawned for Tibet. It is henceforth to be a dependency of China, divided into provinces, under a Chinese viceroy. Colleges are to be established; a Board of Agriculture will direct the farming and mining industries; the men of the country are to be trained for national defense; and postal and telegraph offices are to be opened up everywhere.

This news, which is conveyed in an official announcement, means the breaking up of the ancient lamasery system which has made the country a land of monks and heathen superstition and cruelty and ignorance. Soon we may expect to hear that the Gospel, after knocking at the gates for over a century, is to have free course in Tibet, and that the missionaries are to be admitted as freely as they are now welcomed in other parts of the great Chinese empire. It should become an inviting field for missionary enterprise in the near future.

Concerning Charity

A LONG-TIME reader of this paper, who has had a share in many of its benevolences, writes us:

Speaking of charity, it has often puzzled me to decide whether it is wise to extend our favors to those who seem to be undeserving. I do not refer to impostors—those whom I may call professional beggars or who make charity a trade; but to the man or woman who, through some inherent moral fault, is unable to benefit permanently by the assistance rendered. Is not charity given in such cases wasted, by being diverted to unworthy objects when there are so many who are really worthy?

We think not. True, Christlike charity looks to the immediate need rather than to the circumstances that may have produced such a condition. We should forbear and pity. We need not knowingly bestow our gifts on unworthy objects; but even if we should do so, granting them all the benefit of the doubt, it does not detract from the merit of the deed. Besides, real charity is spontaneous and, seeing actual need, it will not stop to scrutinize too closely. Let your judgment be kind and liberal, for we need to be charitable as much in our opinions as in our purses. And it is better, far better, to err by giving even to the unworthy, than to hold back and commit the more grievous error of leaving one unhelped whom we may possibly have misjudged and wrongfully condemned as undeserving.

Charity, when it proceeds from a sense of duty toward God, the source of all our blessings, and from love of humanity, is the sweetest of all the Christian graces. Indeed, it has been well said that without charity there can be no Christianity in the heart. It is a flower that blossoms best in secret. The charitable soul realizes, with a rare and precious pleasure, that it is richer by what it gives, and that what is given belongs to it forever.

Don't be discouraged if you find that occasionally your charity has been misplaced. God sends his rain alike on the just and the unjust. Some day you may see the effect of your gifts where least expected.

The Reaction Against Noise

THE present summer has been marked by a reaction in many towns against the prevalence of noise. In the suburbs there has been a strenuous effort to suppress the barking of dogs, the crowing of cocks and the mewing of cats. As domestic animals are under the protection of man, and therefore cannot be reasoned with or frightened by fines and penalties, their owners have been notified that they are responsible for the misdemeanors of their pets. The barking of dogs after nine o'clock at night has been voted by certain suburban councils an unbearable annoyance, with the result that in some rural boroughs there are just now fewer dogs than formerly. It remains to be seen whether there will not be in the near future a greater number of confident thieves than dared exercise their trade when watchdogs were vigilant. Undoubtedly, invalids and nervous people are sufferers from the various noises that surround civilized life in city and country. The resident of an apartment house who dislikes music is exasperated at the sound of a neighbor's piano. As for phonographs, megaphones, gongs, siren whistles and the other multiform inventions that invade silence, their name is legion. They cannot be considered adjuncts to comfort; but the question arises whether in the endeavor to suppress them, there may not be trampling on the rights of the individual. It really appears as if there is still room for patience and forbearance, for courtesy and conciliation in this matter of noise, as in most others. No one likes to hear a baby crying in the night, or wailing in a street car, yet the race has always been obliged to put up with the crying of infancy.

Curbing Speed Madness

AUTOMOBILES, which play such an important part in the amusements and daily business of thousands of Americans, have become in many places a menace to life and limb through the carelessness of their drivers. A comparatively few reckless owners have by their acts caused a large portion of people to look on all automobilists as a class who care little for the rights of those who walk or use horses. This is an extreme view, as there is no one who is so hotly opposed to the "scorchers" who want his machine "to eat up the miles," as the average automobile owner who wishes to ride at an ordinary pace and take a sensible outing with family or friends. A large number of accidents have been caused by reckless drivers trying to shoot their machines by people who were driving their automobiles at an ordinary rate of speed. Carriage riding is unsafe in many parts of the country and horseback riding is out of the question. No one can stay on horseback and hold his mount from balking when a machine suddenly swoops by at more than railroad speed.

A speed mania seems to affect some people when they enter an automobile. A young American was killed the other day by his machine striking a tree. People who saw him pass a few moments before said that he was running his machine at about seventy miles an hour. A short time ago Mr. Sears, Boston's richest taxpayer, met an untimely end near Providence, R. I. His car was said to be going sixty miles an hour. It would seem as if such fatal endings to mad rides would dampen the enthusiasm of other reckless automobilists.

A determined effort is being made by men to enjoy this means of recreation, to stop this racing. Long Island is one of the favorite spots for motorists and tourists with cars. The record Nassau County alone since May 1 is sixty people injured and several killed. The supervisors of county have taken the matter up and it is proposed that jail sentences be given for the most flagrant violations of the speed limit instead of the usual fine. They are backed in this plan by the officers of several clubs who desire to stop this road racing, deadly alike to drivers and pedestrians.

Probably after a few severe examples have been made of "scorchers" there will be fewer "death rides" reported in the columns of our daily press.

A Poet's Warning to Drinkers

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE is a poet whose ly till now has been attuned to strains of world pleasure and epicurean philosophy. In his latest poem, "Omar Repentant," he strikes a new key to the theme of his song is the remorse of the drunkard. His strong realistic verses, of which we quote the following, give a new and vivid argument for temperance:

This glorious garment of your youth shall rot
Little by little; you will know it not—
For the moth hides that feeds upon the silk—
And so the garment of your youth shall rot.

Hearken to one who hath the wine-press trod:
Nights shall you cry to your forgotten God,
And wring your hands, and weep hysteric tears,
Till the dawn smites you like a scarlet rod.

These lines sound like a warning voice from the pit. They are in the strongest possible contrast to the impulsive, passionate, unrestrained spirit of the fatalistic, and sometimes ribald, quatrains of the Persian poet and his imitators. Mr. Le Gallienne's new version has given the worshippers of the Rubaiyat a shock, yet not an unwholesome one. We hope it may do good.

Among the Workers

—THE CHRISTIAN WINNERS' BAND of Binghamton, N. Y., are now holding a summer camp at the Montrose Bible Conference. Rev. Dr. Torrey and a company of Bible teachers are in charge.

—THE GLEN ALPINE SPRINGS SCHOOL, of Brindleton, N. C., needs two lady teachers, volunteers for its work of the coming year, one for the intermediate and one for the primary grade. This school situated among the mountains of western North Carolina, is industrial in character, and furnishes instruction to white boys and girls who cannot secure an education in any other way. Teachers should be between thirty and fifty, adaptable and willing to "rough it" a little. Rev. R. D. Schoonmaker, 1060 Central Ave. Plainfield, N. J., will answer all inquiries concerning the work.

The Hall of Christ

THE Rev. Dr. William J. Hart, in a communication to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has this to say of the Hall of Christ at Chautauqua: "On the first Tuesday of August, 1900, the cornerstone of the Hall of Christ, a building designed for a unique purpose, was laid on the grounds of the Chautauqua Assembly. Since that date work has been done as rapidly as funds permitted. Ten thousand dollars are still needed to complete the Hall when the present season opened. This amount was asked for on "Old First Night," August 4, and was quickly and enthusiastically given. The dedication service will, therefore, occur this season."

Bishop Vincent gives the following reasons for the erection of this building:

"It is the mission of the Hall of Christ to study the life and career of Jesus as a babe, boy, man, teacher, prophet, reformer, and as the King of men; the critical study of every word and line concerning him in both the Old and New Testament, and especially the study of Christ as the greatest of all teachers."

"The studies of this Hall will bring before us the theories of great teachers and theologians concerning this remarkable character. It will give special attention to the training of little children and youth concerning him who was pre-eminently the children's friend; putting into their memories his words of wisdom and comfort."

"We hope to place here a library of the lives of Christ and to make a collection of engravings and photography of everything that art has produced in commendation of him. It is moreover to be a place of reverent worship, making two emphases: 1, thoroughness, conscientiousness and reverence in the study of the life of Christ; and, 2, an honest attempt to reproduce his life of holy service, who 'went about doing good,' and whose spirit and ministry of help are now needed in all parts of the world, in neighborhood and social reform and in international Christian co-operation looking to the uplift of humanity."

There is another Hall of Christ—in Africa. It is a church of the American Presbyterian Congo Mission, Ibanchi, Kassai District, Congo Free State, Africa, under the care of Rev. J. McC. Sieg, which stands for the message of Christ's salvation to dying men, and especially to those who have never heard of him. The piles of brick and stone and wood are only valuable for the ideas, the sentiments which they contain. There is no thought that can engage the mind of man, or sentiment that can thrill the human heart, like Christ, learning about him and the way to him and telling him and bringing him to others. So that there is nothing more beautiful or sublime or divine on the planet, than a Hall of Christ to learn about the Saviour and the Hall of Christ to convey him to others.

Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone. (Eph. 2: 20.)

A Baby's Strong Grip

Mrs. Graf was on the fire-escape of her flat in New York recently, hanging out clothes, and did not notice the baby climb after her. She looked around in time to see the child fall through the well hole of the escape. She fainted when she saw the child fall. At the fourth floor the falling child struck the rail of the fire-escape and in that manner was thrown outside of it. By one of those chances that come about once in a million times, the child, as it passed the third floor fire-escape, brushed the rail so closely that her fingers caught the iron bar and held on. It seems that the father was an athlete of some repute and commenced to teach his three children, when they were mere babies, athletic exercises. Helen, the baby who fell, was only twenty months old, but her father had taught her to take hold of a broomstick while he carried her about the room, and other things that developed the muscles of her arms and hands, so that when she struck the bar she was able to cling to it and hold her weight by it.

The young are susceptible, at the very earliest age, to educational influences upon the body, mind

He is credited with having given the first inspiration to the anti-opium policy and with having drafted the Anti-Opium Bill. It is the determination of the Chinese government to send a hundred young men each year for four years to be educated in America, and after that fifty students each year will be sent, until the indemnity fund shall have been exhausted.

If there was good principle and policy as well in the action of our government, how beautiful also has been the action of China! What delightful international relationships are promoted and what a superb opportunity America has to touch the better thought and life of China through the young men who are so soon to lead in the councils! It looks as though honesty, in this instance, has proven itself to be the best policy, but the action of the United States government was honesty from principle and has in it every reward. Too long has China been an easy prey to the robber nations of the earth, and our country has done more than any other to teach the lesson of honesty in dealing with weaker peoples. That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. (I. Tim. 2: 2.)

Count Zeppelin's Airship

Count Ferdinand Zeppelin on July 1 outdistanced all world records for steering balloons. He remained in the air for twelve hours, passing over the greater part of northern Switzerland, visiting Zurich, Winterthur and Lucerne, making an average speed of thirty-four miles an hour. A crew of fourteen, under the leadership of the Count, navigated the airship. It was about one o'clock when the balloon came into view at Lucerne and the thousands of astonished tourists from all parts of the world, including hundreds of Americans, greeted her with loud cheering as she sailed quickly over the waters of the lake. With the greatest precision Count Zeppelin guided his airship and carried out a long series of evolutions, which included various figures, circles, sharp turns, descents and ascents, and then made a tour of the whole lake and returned to the place from which he started, where the people were waiting with a salute of guns and the cheers of the multitude to welcome him. The greatest altitude reached in the voyage was 2,500 feet and the distance covered was 220 miles. The next experiment promised to be more brilliant, but when the journey was about half over, the airship encountered a terrific thunder storm in which the balloon was burned. The Count cried like a child at the catastrophe. The German government sent him $125,000 which had been voted for experimentation and the people of Germany personally subscribed more than $250,000, and the Count intends to build a better ship. Most of the governments of the world, including the United States, have made appropriations for balloon experimentation, for observation purposes during a military campaign. Whatever new part the balloon of the future may play in the wars of the world, it may possibly become a safe as well as swift method of transportation. The greyhound of the sea and the mile-a-minute express train on the railroad would have seemed as great impossibilities to the people of the "stage coach" time as the navigation of the heavens by airships would appear to us to-day.

Yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. (Psa. 18: 10.)

and soul. How important it is that due care be given to the physical training, the educational instruction and the moral tuition of the children! The early training saves many a child from a fatal fall.

Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it. (Prov. 22: 6.)

Dorando Faints in the Race

The great Marathon race from Windsor Castle to the Stadium, a distance of twenty-six miles, took place July 24. The little Italian Dorando was the first to appear at the Stadium, finishing the race in two hours, 54 minutes and 46 seconds, or nine miles an hour. J. J. Hayes, an American who arrived in two hours, 55 minutes and 18 seconds, was declared the winner, as Dorando had to be helped to rise when he fell at the end through exhaustion. Though the Queen gave the Italian a prize, the trophy went to Hayes. In the temporal and spiritual race of life the one who holds out to the end wins. Alas! some fall down as they are about to reach the Stadium.

He that endureth to the end shall be saved. (Matt. 10: 22.)

Questions and Answers

Mary F., Syracuse, N. Y. What was the inspiration which caused Ruskin to write his Sesame and Lilies?

It was said to be his beautiful affection for little Rose La Touche, a sweet, blue-eyed Irish wee maid of ten, whose growth and intellectual development Ruskin watched with more than paternal solicitude. She died at twenty-one, Ruskin being then a man of fifty.

E. H., Versailles, Ind. 1. Why did Christ tell his disciples to buy swords (Luke 22:36), and then heal the man whom Peter smote (Luke 22:51)? 2. What is the meaning of "baptized for the dead" (1. Cor. 15:29)?

1. Jesus wished them to be forewarned of the world's hostility to the Gospel. He spoke in figurative language, as he frequently did, and they, misunderstanding him, interpreted his words literally, supposing he alluded to present defense. Seeing that they misinterpreted his language about the swords, he closed the conversation with the words: "It is enough." His healing of the servant's ear simply emphasized the fact that he had not intended to counsel physical violence. 2. Bengel translated this "over the dead" or "immediately upon the dead," meaning those who will be gathered to the dead immediately after baptism. Many in the ancient church put off baptism till near death. The passage probably referred to some symbolical rite of baptism or dedication of themselves to follow the dead even to death.

C. M. K., Cordele, Ga. See Matt. 16:28; Mark 9:1, and Luke 9:27. Please advise as to the meaning of this Scripture.

This passage is frequently misunderstood. Mark has it: "till they see the Kingdom of God come with power" (which is the more explicit), and Luke: "till they see the Kingdom." Jesus is believed to have had reference to the realization of the firm establishment and victorious progress of the new Kingdom of Christ during the lifetime of some then present. He did not refer to his second coming, but to the founding and triumphant extension of that work, the acceptance of which by the world was to be the grand pledge of his return.

M. E., Buffalo, N. Y. Is the word "Reverend" found in the Bible as a title for a man?

No; it is merely a title of courtesy and has come into common usage as applied to the clergy. It does not seem to have been used in the early days of the Christian Church.

W. R. C., Lynchburg, Va. Why do not the people who contribute to your "Answered Prayers" column give their names and addresses for publication?

They do in almost every case, but we print only initials. The public acknowledgment is not wholly confined to what is printed in these pages. In conversation with friends and acquaintances, in their church relationship, and in other ways, these earnest people let the fact become known that God has heard and answered prayer.

G. H. A., Loveland, Colo. What is meant by "So shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Matt. 12:40)?

It was the second public announcement of his coming resurrection. Jonah's case was analogous as having been followed by a glorious mission to the Gentiles. The "heart of the earth" simply meant the grave, and the three days and three nights was expressing in the ordinary Jewish way of speaking, which reckoned any part of a day, counted with a period of several days, as a full day.

M. M., Atlanta, Ga. We are greatly pleased with the courageous stand THE CHRISTIAN HERALD takes when it deals with the higher critics, and in defense of the Bible and the "old-time religion." Your definition of higher criticism was a most enlightening one. In what particular instances has it collapsed in the past?

In practically every important instance. Rev. W. H. Bates, in The Bible Student, ably reviews the case. The critics first contended that writing was unknown in the time of Moses, and did not come into use until about B.C. 520 in Greece. This contention has been exploded by the indisputable evidence that as long ago as B.C. 2061, Egypt and Babylonia were highly civilized and had schools, libraries and a notable literary class. This culture was shared by Syria and Palestine and Mesopotamia. Egypt at the time of the exodus was a land of culture, and so was Canaan, where the Israelites went. The next higher critical theory to collapse was what is called the "composite structure of the Pentateuch," which Professor Green of Princeton punctured irredeemably in 1898, and Professor Sayce even a year earlier. The two exploded contentions alone covered the most important ground of the higher critics.

B. F. B., Allentown, Pa. Do we read of any idol worship before the deluge? When did idol worship begin?

The Bible contains no statement as to the existence of antediluvian idolatry, but it is a fair presumption that it was practised before the Flood. There is trace of heathen divinities in the names of antediluvians. The Egyptian Set is supposed to be Seth, the patriarch. Enoch is recognized in Annacus or Nannacus. These of course are conjectures, but they go to establish the great antiquity of idol worship.

P. P., Esmond, N. D. Do the cruelties in the Congo still continue?

They are more concealed than formerly, but comparatively recent photographs show that the

D. M. S., Guymon, Okla. 1. How are church chimes played, and can they be played in any key? 2. Explain "first cousin once removed." 3. What are Bulls and Bears in finance? 4. Are there any "greenbacks" in circulation, and if so, are they "legal tender"?

1. Chimes are made up of any number of bells from three up, tuned in harmony. Chimes that strike the hour are rung by clockwork. The old way, and one which is yet practised on great days at Christ Church in Boston, is to have a bell-ringer for every bell. A leader holds the score and indicates to each player when he shall pull his rope. In Trinity Church, New York, and other modern churches, one man plays the chimes from a sort of piano, levers taking the place of keys. Six changes may be rung on three bells, twenty-four on four, one hundred and twenty on five, and seven hundred and twenty on six, etc. 2. A "first cousin once removed" is the child of one's first cousin. 3. "Bull" is the name popularly given to a broker who tries to advance the prices of stock. "Bears" are brokers who are trying to bring prices lower. 4. Yes; the ordinary bank note, on account of its color, is known as a greenback. By the act of 1876 they were fixed right to punish the violation of the first four commandments. He was later banished and four companions settled on the site of Providence R. I., in 1636, where he founded the Colony of Rhode Island and established freedom of conscience. 2. No, there was already a Baptist denomination in England during the reign of Henry VIII. Their doctrines were transplanted to America about the year 1631.

J. W. B., Pinetown, N. C. 1. Where was land of Uz, where Job lived? 2. When was this meeting of the sons of God and the devil, and who were these sons of God?

Uz was a district of Northern Arabia. 2. "Sons of God" clearly refers to the angels or messengers who presented themselves to give account for their service. "Satan" means "adversary," "accuser," and in the present case he appears as the accuser of Job. Having fallen himself, having been the successful agent in Adam's temptation, he is confident that Job's piety, like that of most of the fallen race, will not stand the test of temptation and trial. The name "Job" is variously interpreted: in Arabic, to signify "to turn" or "to repent," and in Hebrew, "one greatly tried," or one to whom "enmity has been shown." Job is believed by the ablest scholars to be the oldest book in the Bible.

Jessie R., Binghamton, N. Y. I think of forming an Audubon Club, to assist in the movement for the preservation of the song-birds. Is the movement confined to this country or has it extended abroad?

A bill has been introduced in the British Parliament to prohibit the importation of the plumage of certain song-birds. At the plume auction in London, recently, there were catalogued 19,742 skins of birds of paradise alone, and 1,411 white herons (egrets), besides many thousands of other ornamental plumaged birds. One firm catalogued 20,000 kingfishers.

J. R., Bellville, Wis. What did Jesus mean in John 20:17, where he said: "Touch me not"?

It was not a time for the old familiar greeting or handclasps. He had not come to renew the former human associations with his followers. Great change had taken place. The crown of his life-work is not yet complete. He must show himself in a resurrected body to his disciples before he ascends to the Father. He evidently comprehended the significance of the chance and went at once to the disciples.

OFF FOR THE WEDDING TOUR

THE judicious have long counseled greater privacy for the newly married during their wedding journey. Probably this may be secured by the automobile honeymoon; but certain other reforms in the line of refinement and good taste seem not to have been thereby attained, if one may judge from the picture here presented. At the back of the vehicle, a mischievous guest seems to be affixing old shoes or white ribbons. In front, another "friend" is daintily reaching for rice. All such customs, no matter how elegantly observed, are to be deprecated, and especially the rice throwing; but even the balloon honeymoon may be unable to banish them. The most joyous of human festivals has also a sacredness and delicate beauty with which these coarse attempts at humor are utterly inharmonious.

1. The faith of the Mohammedans is called Islam (surrender of the will to God). Five duties are exacted of the faithful Mohammedan: a belief that there is but one God and that Mohammed is his prophet, fasting, prayer, the giving of alms and a pilgrimage to Mecca. Their Sabbath comes on Friday. 2. It is an old German myth. In some of the cities of Germany, storks are protected and build their nests on chimney tops.

Colporteurs Selling Bibles in the Market-Place

An Iquique Colporteur

The Valley and the Desert, Peru

THE traveler along the Pacific Slope finds great stretches of the coast of Chile and Peru which are vast deserts, where no rain has fallen in the memory of man. After crossing, on mule back, leagues of parched ground the eye is refreshed by the beautiful valleys of green sugar-cane or cereals, grown entirely by means of irrigation from the river and streams which rise up in the eternal snows of the high Andes. Where the land has been flooded by the river the Peruvian farmer goes forth to sow the face of the muddy earth; the seeds take root, and by and by a rich harvest is reaped.

During the last few years, a great deal of plowing and sowing has been in progress in Iquique and Antofagasta by Christian Bible men. Iquique is the principal nitrate port in the world. Antofagasta is another important nitrate port and the open door to Bolivia on the elevations of the Andes.

Where is Iquique? was the question asked of school boys not very long ago by a leading London paper. There it lies on the coast of Chile half buried at the foot of the sand hills on a rocky ledge, jutting out into the sea. From one year's end to the other no rain falls on its parched soil and there is no river near. Yet here is a flourishing seaport with some 10,000 inhabitants. Its bay is a forest of masts of ships from all parts of the world, but were it not for nitrate there would be no Iquique. To supply its inhabitants with pure, fresh water a line of pipes, forty miles long, has been laid across the nitrate pampa. For many years the Methodist Episcopal Society has carried on a flourishing college for native boys and girls and has a very successful mission among the Spanish speaking peoples. Dr. Lover, the late Mr. Harrington and others have labored here with signal blessing from God. The work has not been confined to Iquique itself, but has spread across the deserts from oficina to oficina (this is the name given to the factories for the elaborating of nitrate).

Through the generosity of the manager of the nitrate railways, our colporteur carries his Gospel seed-bag across this unpromising desert region from year to year without cost to the Bible Society. This is a handsome gift to Protestant missions. If you want to accompany him across the so-called nitrate fields, put on your dust cloak and protect your eyes with a pair of goggles against the sand storms that blow there.

The nitrate is found back of a low range of mountains rising abruptly from the sea coast. To reach this district we take the train at Iquique and slowly climb the range which rises behind the town over rocks and sand, turning curves and twisting through cuttings until we arrive at the summit of this coast range about 2,000 feet high. As we look back we catch a glimpse of the blue Pacific, while far below us lies Iquique like a German toy-shop painted in a variety of colors. Before us lie vast stretches of desert, the famous nitrate pampa, dotted with factories and small railways. Away towards the east looms a beautiful picture of ranges of mountains, rising into the heavens. It is the Andes of Bolivia with here and there a beautiful snow peak rising far above the fleecy clouds. Drovers of mules and donkeys raising clouds of dust are seen, and the wild cry of the arriero (driver) is heard as he urges his animals forward with voice and blow across this dreary desert. "Hacho mula!" "Vaya mula!" "Caramba mula!" are a few of the numerous exclamations and epithets of these pampa drivers. The desert itself is strewn with the bones of animals that have succumbed for the want of food and water.

There are about ninety oficinas or factories scattered across the Tarapaca desert, for the extraction of nitrate of soda from the caliche. The raw material, called caliche, is found under a layer of sand, blasted or dug out of the earth. It is then transported to the factories, where it is boiled down and crystallized. Around the central residence of the administrator is grouped the factory with its plant of steam boilers and elevated boiling-tanks for dissolving the caliche and extracting the nitrate from the sand and dirt. Thence the nitrate is transported to the ports at the coast and shipped to all parts of the world, for nitrate is a universal fertilizer for the earth. Over 25,000 people are employed on the Tarapaca nitrate fields.

Stretching away from the machinery and central residences are the workmen's houses, stores, saloons for drinking and gambling, and probably a small school. It would be difficult to find worse houses anywhere in the world than some of these workmen's houses of the pampa. Fortunately, the climate, at an elevation of 2,000 to 4,000 feet, is very healthy. As nothing whatever grows in the neighborhood, all supplies are imported. Flour and tinned goods come from San Francisco. Fruits and vegetables are brought by steamers from Peru, Ecuador and Southern Chile. Cattle are driven across the elevations from the Argentine. Coal is brought from Australia.

On these dreary nitrate fields there is ample room for the colporteur's ministry. In the evening a good congregation can be gathered, and the good news of God's love and salvation can be poured into the ears of the listeners, and the people lifted from the dreary monotony of the pampa life to Him who has the words of eternal life. How well the colporteur in this region handles his books will be seen from his monthly reports. Last year he sold 787 Bibles, 903 Testaments and 3,400 portions of the Gospel and Psalters.

This work is carried on among all classes, Chilians, Italians, Turks, Chinamen, etc. Here, it may be, is a blatant infidel ridiculing the Christian faith by oaths and curses, and striking terror into the heart of the colporteur. There, it may be, a group of mechanics away on a debauch, who are more pleased with the taste of liquor than a taste for pure literature. Here, a house of evil-doers wedded to their sin. Anon, it may be a Christian family, which has migrated from Iquique to the pampa in search of work. Such welcome the kindly visit of the man with the Book.

For nearly two years Ramon Villafuerte, a Bible colporteur, who speaks Spanish and Quechua, has been at work over this extensive region, assisted this year by others whom he himself has influenced. They visit the market place, the wharves, the plaza, and have permission to sell on the railway platform. One morning on that station platform I saw them clear out their whole stock of books among the passengers who were going far into the interior. One indignant passenger, as he saw people purchasing Bibles, exclaimed: "Qué plaga de Biblias en Antofagasta!" We rejoiced indeed that there should be a plague of Bibles in this needy district.

Some time ago, you kindly inserted a plea for Sunday School lesson picture rolls, and there were several kind responses. The picture rolls were of the greatest service in the hands of the colporteurs. I could use to splendid advantage a fresh supply. I am sure many a soul has been arrested by the message of salvation through those rolls, and blessing has been the result.

I leave soon for an extended journey of some 4,000 miles by land and sea in the interest of God's work in South America. May I ask for the prayers of your readers on my own behalf and for the family I leave behind?

A. R. STARK.

"YOUNG MAN, KEEP YOUR RECORD"

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THIS is the proper time to review the life of Saul and Jonathan, and Israel's first experiment in king making, under such themes as the following: 1. God is our rightful king. 2. A godly young man who makes a good start, may be switched off by some little sin and make a bad end. 3. Envy and jealousy lead to meanness and murder. 4. So good a man as Jonathan, if he does not break altogether with bad companions, even in his own household, will come to grief. 5. When God is lost out of the life, the end must be defeat and hopeless death. 6. God's punishments in the past show the fallacy of the argument that he can not punish in the future world.

1. God our rightful king. When Garibaldi had delivered Italy from its oppressors and was standing with his soldiers in the throne room of Francis of Naples, his followers gathered about him and said, "You shall be our king. Viva Garibaldi!" They tried to push and drag him to the throne, but he said, firmly, "Never will I be king. Washington refused a kingdom. He has been my example thus far, and shall be to the end. It is a very foolish thing to undertake to be a king. I will not even be longer general, now that liberty is secured; but, like Washington, I will resign my commission and take no pay." And he borrowed $20 of a friend to pay his way back to his cottage home.

A Disappointing Life

2. A good start, but a bad end—why? Christian young men may well take warning when one who started out with so many good qualities as Saul did, who was modest, brave, spiritual (I. Sam. 9: 1, 2, 5; 10: 7-10, 22; 11: 6), develops so many deadly faults (18: 7-11; 19: 10; 20: 30-33; 22: 9-19), and finally comes to a hopeless death (Matt. 7: 22, 23). It was by little sins, step by step, he fell away (I. Sam. 13: 8-14; cf. 14: 18-20), and chiefly by one act of disobedience, prompted by covetousness (I. Sam. 15: 19-23). He lost heaven by trying to take too many fat cattle in his train. Many a young man is trying to carry too much baggage in his march to heaven, and will have to give up some of his beastly ways and selfish indulgences, or fall out by the way, as did Saul. To change the figure, Saul was like a goodly ship that starts out with all sails set and high hopes of success, which is wrecked at last because the compass is diverted or the chart is neglected.

3. Envy and Jealousy. Once when a candidate for office in ancient Sparta lost an election as one of the three hundred citizens who were to govern, he rejoiced that three hundred better men than he could be found in the city. What a contrast to the jealousy and envy which we see in Saul, as in many others, that never can be at heartease when they see others honored as much or more than themselves.

Recently a Philadelphia daily paper received a letter from a man who has long and vainly hunted clouds under the trees in the parks, supposing that when the rain is "squeezed out" they fall to the ground in a gelatinous state. He desired to know from the omniscient editor of the query column where and how he could get a basketful of old clouds. We can tell him how to find clouds every day, even in the most sunny days. Let him allow envy and jealousy to dwell in his heart, and every man's success and every woman's joy will put a cloud of sticky misery in his soul.

4. Should Jonathan have left Saul? Jonathan's courageous defense of David before his envious father, and his love for David, who was to displace him, were noble qualities.

To young Americans personifying their country as "Brother Jonathan," the term may well recall that prince of Israel who rose above the narrow watchword, "My family, right or wrong," and stood for justice, even to his rival, at the peril of his life. It is such Greathearts that make a country great, rather than high buildings and broad acres. Epictetus said to the Athenians at a time of degeneracy, "You Athenians will confer the greatest benefit on your city, not by raising the roofs of your dwellings, but by exalting the souls of your fellow citizens; for it is better that great souls should live in small habitations than that abject slaves should burrow in great houses."

Not high-raised battlement or labored mound,
Thick walls or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts.
No! Men—high-minded men;
Men who their duties know,
And know their rights, and knowing, dare main-
Prevent the long-aimed blow.
And crush the tyrant, while they rend the chain—
These constitute a state;
And sovereign law that, with collected will,
On crowns and globes elate
Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill.

5. Two kinds of death. During the the witch as hell's advance agent to help him in his last battle, where in utter defeat he significantly fell on his own sword. The men of Jabesh-Gilead remembered only his good deed to them (I. Sam. 11: 1-11) and rescued his body from his foes. David forgot all Saul's personal attacks and sang of his noble qualities in earlier days.

Let us not forget that death is a terror even to good people, where immortality has not been brought to light by the story and words of Christ. In a Chinese city, a native Christian summoned the missionary at night to see a dying man. He found the sick man surrounded by weeping friends. "Why do you weep?" "We pity him, for he is going out into the dark, and he's so frightened to go." The sick man himself said dying was like going into the night outside. The missionary told him of the light of the world. Between spasms of pain he heard a few words and said, "It's very good, it's joyful to hear, but it's too late. Why didn't you come before?" In another testament and the newest, of nature and experience, given in the last son, some of the warning arrows at God lovingly shoots in the Bible across our sinful path.

What many sentimentally say could not do in the future, he has done in the past in the flood and fire, which sin was punished in the day of Noah and Abraham and Moses. When Lot told his friends of the hell that was awaiting Sodom, his widows-in-law laughed at the idea. It was to them "as one that jested." Perhaps they said, "Your talk of fire is all figurative, and besides God is good to punish; and at any rate we are not going to be frightened out of Sodom." And so they laughed and perished, as so many of their successors have and will.

The historical books from Joshua to Esther shoot again and again the two arrows, "They did evil," "They had distress," that men might learn that by the deep laws of the universe penalty here and hereafter follows transgression.

Never Do Anything You Would Not Be Willing to Die Doing

John B. Gough died with the sentence at the top of this page on his lips—a warning that fitly closes the story of Saul's wrecked life. But John Gough doubtless meant that you men should "keep their record clear from the start, rather than begin wrong and, after years of dissipating to God only half or less of the light that should be wholly devoted to the glory of God and the good of mankind. Even repentance does not cut off the consequences of sin.

Jonathan's early death carries such regret of self-destruction. He died young but in what he regarded as the path of duty, defending his country against its foes. His father's sin in relying on the so-called witch Endor, as the supposed agent of the devil, hastened the death of his son. Jonathan died with a "clean record" and we all expect to meet him as one of the heroes of heaven. "His love for me was wonderful, passing the love of women," said David in his funeral song. Let young men seek to be "clean," as free from selfishness as from envy, as eager to help others who are worthy to rise even at their own cost and the world will be brighter for their lives, even where such malice as Saul's would otherwise make it a midnight, and death shall not end the usefulness but only begin for them a new career of immortal life in heaven and immortal influence for good on earth.

Called Higher

The wife of the late Rev. B. E. Mayo, of Vincennes, Ind., a subscriber to the HERALD, was called to her heavenly home May 30, in her eighty-sixth year. She was a lovely Christian character.

Mrs. James Goodsell, of New Haven, Conn., recently entered into life eternal at the age of ninety-one. She was one of the oldest members of the Grand Avenue Congregational Church and a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

Mrs. Gertrude Joslin entered into rest at her home in Jerusalem, N.Y., in her ninety-third year. She was a member of the Reformed Church and a sincere Christian. Her Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were great comforts to her in her declining years.

Miss B. D. Bryant, of Haverhill, Mass., was called higher January 21, 1908. She was interested in all Christian work and a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She was a member of the Baptist Church and was noted for her Christian influence.

Mrs. Mary Allen, of Howard, O., has gone home. Though for many years an invalid, she was never heard to utter a complaining word, her room being always one of the sunniest corners in the home. She was for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. C. J. Miller, who was born in Germany June 6, 1855, died at her home in Parkersburg, at the age of fifty-two years. When fourteen years old she came to this country and settled with other relatives at Rochester, N.Y. In 1874 she joined the German Baptist Church at Rochester. In 1874 she married Rev. John Miller. This union was blessed with six daughters and five sons. She was a faithful wife and a loving mother. She came to Parkersburg with her husband, the pastor of the German Baptist church. She was a friend of the Bowery Mission and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Defeat and Death of King Saul

Civil War, a company of Federal soldiers defending Rodman's Point were overpowered by the Confederates and took possession of a scow in which to cross the Tar River. When loaded it stuck fast in the mud. Exposure was certain death. Several soldiers were about to spring out from the sheltering sides to push it off, when a large negro said, "You keep still, and save your life. I can't fight. I can push off the boat. If they kill me, it is nothing. You are soldiers, and they need you to fight." He leaped overboard, pushing the boat into the stream, and sprang back pierced by seven bullets, a sacrifice to patriotism.

A Significant Death

Saul's death was of another type. God had left him, and eternal death had already begun before he turned to case the Word was not too late. It was a Chinese boy. He said to the missionary who had been sent for, "They whisper to each other that I am dying—going out into the dark, and I am so frightened." The missionary told him day by day of the Good Shepherd and his lambs. Just before he died the boy said to his friends: "I'm not frightened now. The Lord Jesus has come to fetch me. He's going to carry me up into the light—he who blessed little children. That's why I'm not afraid."

O Land! O Land!
For all the broken-hearted
The mildest herald by our fate allotted,
Beckons, and with inverted torch doth stand
To lead us with a gentle hand
Into the land of the great departed,
Into the Silent Land!

This is a fitting place to add to the warning arrows found in the oldest

GIPSY SMITH'S LATEST AMERICAN VISIT

EVANGELIST GIPSY SMITH is about to begin a twelve months' spiritual campaign in the United States. He left Liverpool on July 18, intending to remain in Ohio for about six weeks, preaching in different places. After that he expects to begin an evangelistic campaign in Baltimore in September, and to continue it for six months, closing with a series of meetings in Toronto.

Mr. Smith is well known in both the United States and Canada, as he has visited both countries a number of times. He is one of the three leading evangelists of the National Free Church Council of Great Britain. Tens of thousands of people have professed conversion to Christ in the meetings conducted by him.

The photograph on this page shows Mr. and Mrs. Gipsy Smith on board the Campania, at Liverpool, just as Mr. and Mrs. Smith were leaving for their ten months' evangelistic campaign in America. Gipsy Smith, the famous British evangelist, is in the center of the illustration. Mrs. Gipsy Smith is on his right, and his sister, Mrs. Gipsy Evens, on his left. Beside Mrs. Evens is Mr. G. Evens, Gipsy Smith's brother-in-law. On the left of the illustration is Mr. William Noble, an energetic young Wesleyan local preacher, who lives in Liverpool. For seventeen years Mr. and Mrs. G. Evens have made their home in Liverpool, while conducting missions throughout the British Isles. They are now the principal helpers of Rev. Joseph Jackson, Superintendent of the great Wesleyan Central Mission Hall in Liverpool.

Mrs. Gipsy Evens possesses much of the pathos, power, and tenderness of her famous brother, and for many years she has been engaged in evangelistic work. Mr. Evens is not a gipsy, but a Devonshire Englishman, although his dark hair and features lead many to suppose that he is related to the Romany people.

Work at Northfield

TWO Conferences and two summer schools are in session this month at Northfield, each of which attracts a large number of people. The Student Conference, just closing its session, has been the largest ever held. The Young Women's Conference has delegates from Wellesley, Farmington, Dobbs Ferry, Dana Hall and many churches in the larger cities. A special course is given in Sunday School methods, with a class of children to illustrate upon. At the twenty-sixth session of the General Conference for Christian Workers Charles Mr. Alexander, evangelist, leads the singing. Among the speakers announced are Dr. Hugh Black, Dr. Len G. Broughton, Dr. R. A. Torrey, Dr. A. T. Pierson, Rev. C. A. R. Janvier, Rev. J. D. Adams and Rev. C. C. Creagan, of this country, and Dr. W. L. Watkinson and Rev. J. Stuart Holden, of London, and Rev. J. A. Hutton and Rev. W. B. Macleod, of Scotland. Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, of London, will speak during the Post Conference.

OUR GOVERNMENT'S AIRSHIP TESTS

REALIZING the growing importance of aeronautics, the United States government has decided to give every assistance to the development of the science of aerial navigation. The Aeronautical Board of the Army has lately been taking an active interest in experiments with the dirigible balloon constructed by Captain Baldwin, and which, if certain requirements are satisfactorily fulfilled, will probably be accepted by the Department.

The Baldwin balloon looks not unlike the famous Zeppelin balloon which as done such remarkably successful work in Switzerland; yet its construction differs in many important details. It has a four-cylinder 25-horse power motor. More than eighteen miles an hour were made in a recent trial with the propeller making 400 revolutions a minute. The propeller is believed to be capable of making 550 revolutions and should develop a speed of twenty-two miles an hour. Captain Baldwin will receive $6,750 for his airship if twenty miles an hour is made in the official speed trial. Fifteen per cent. over and above the contract price will be paid by the government for each additional mile over twenty an hour made by Captain Baldwin, up to 24 miles.

Disaster marked the first official flight of the dirigible at Fort Myer. Observers saw the airship rise and fall, dipping its nose so deeply that it almost stood on end. A wire leading to a cylinder had broken, and had to be repaired in mid-air. Then another wire became misplaced. When a mile and a quarter from the starting point, the propeller dropped and the airship settled slowly toward the ground, on a farm. The cause of this unfortunate climax was a broken connection of the secondary wire leading to the timer. After repairing the airship, Mr. Baldwin sailed her back to the starting point, and succeeded in making a mile and a quarter in five minutes, or at the rate of fifteen miles an hour. The official Aeronautical Board consists of Major Squier, Captain Wallace, Lieutenant Lahm and Lieutenant Creecy, of the Marine Corps.

AN UNCOMMON LIFE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

NEARLY six years have passed since Alice Freeman Palmer, known and loved by thousands of American women, passed away from earth. Her death at forty-seven seemed at first an irreparable loss to her friends and the public. Few women have more deeply impressed themselves upon the life of the times than she, and few have had so great a genius for seeing the opportunity and filling the occasion. At twenty-six Alice Freeman became President of Wellesley, where she had previously taught. The stamp of her rich personality was impressed on the institution, and her influence there is vitally felt to this day. In December, 1887, two days before Christmas, she was married to Professor Palmer of Harvard University, to whom she had been for some months engaged. Her husband in writing her memoir has paid a deserved tribute to her as woman, educator, comrade, friend and perfect wife. The charming book issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Company with the title Alice Freeman Palmer, has reached its fifth edition, and it is not too much to say of it that no biography recently published has so direct a message and so exquisite a meaning as this to the American home. I wish it might be read by all our girls whether they are college students, young women in business, or daughters at home.

Alice Freeman was born at Colesville, N. Y., in 1855. Her childhood was spent in a quiet country home. Her husband says, "The influences which chiefly shaped her childhood were her country life, her narrow means, and her father's change of occupation."

All through her life she regarded it as a great privilege to have been country-bred, and she pitied children brought up amid the turmoil of cities. When busy and weary she would always return to the country to be made over, and nothing rested her like tarrying for a while in the solitude of the woods where the little folk, birds, rabbits and squirrels, were her fearless intimates. On both sides her ancestry was of the best. They are thus described: "Few of her ancestors figured in the newspapers, or had any considerable share of wealth or learning. They were of that sturdy stock which has been the glory of America—men and women who in quiet homes pride themselves on duty and intelligence, who think about each day's work and carefully accomplish it; people on whom neighbors can rely, and who are willing to be overlooked in the public interest." When Alice was seven years old an idea that had long possessed her father's mind grew into an importunate desire. He wished to study medicine and practise it, and Alice's mother undertook the care and support of her family of four children during the two years of his absence at the Albany Medical School. These years taught the child a lesson which she never forgot, the lesson that for the sake of an ideal sacrifice and self-denial may be joyfully borne. A year or two before her death she said to me: "I was the daughter of a country doctor, and I owe much of the success of my life, much of its gladness and wideness, to the long drives I used to take when, a little girl, I sat by my father as he made his long rounds to visit his patients."

I pass over the intervening years of girlhood and training, simply remarking that Alice Freeman was a graduate of Ann Arbor University, which she entered in 1872. President Angell of that university was impressed with the quick intelligence, earnest nature and bright helpfulness of the young girl, who at seventeen, having had only the advantages of a village academy, was not thoroughly prepared for work in the university. Her diligence and enthusiasm soon enabled her to catch and keep the pace of her classmates. It is of her career as a distinguished teacher, organizer and college president that I especially wish to write, a career brilliant and impressive beyond most, and almost unique of its kind. She individualized her students, knowing their weak points, strengthening them where they needed assistance and giving each something of her radiant self. A young girl coming from home for her freshman year at college, shy, awkward and homesick, received a warm greeting from the president at once, and felt herself taken under her brooding sisterly wing. If it happened, as it does in every large institution, that a student came who did not fit in, who was lawless and required taming, or unpopular and in need of friendship, Miss Freeman's gentle tact, inflexible will and marvelous art in inducing others to work with her, brought that girl into touch with the rest.

A suggestive anecdote is given illustrating her attitude as to possible slights. So many girls and women suffer from over-sensitiveness or morbid vanity that there is a hint in the incident that may benefit many a diffident or easily irritated reader. "There came to Wellesley for a period of special study a woman who had already spent several years in teaching. She was nervous, vain, and touchy, easily finding in whatever was said or looked some covert disparagement of herself. As she was complaining one day of some recent rudeness, Miss Freeman said: 'Why not be superior to these things and let them go unregarded? You will soon find you have nothing to regard.' 'Miss Freeman,' retorted Miss S., 'I wonder how you would like to be insulted.' Miss Freeman drew herself up with splendid dignity: 'Miss S., there is no one living who could insult me.' And she was right. Nobody would have dared to do so. But had they attempted it, they would have found her altogether beyond their reach."

In common with the great teachers who went before her, Mary Lyon, Emma Willard and others who were pioneers, Alice Freeman possessed a rare insight into girlish character. She seemed by intuition to know a girl's good points, and she held each up to the best level of which she was capable. She would say to a girl: "Of course you couldn't do anything in this matter that is untrue or unladylike. That would be quite out of keeping with you." And the wavering girl was promptly strengthened in her determination to do the right thing at any cost. She used the same method in stimulating students to do their very best intellectually. If a girl received an alluring invitation to go somewhere a little before the end of a term, thus involving a break in her term work, Miss Freeman did not refuse her consent, nor show reluctance to give permission for the little outing. She would put before the girl, half casually, the reasons why it would be better in the end for her to place her college work first and her pleasure second, and the student would go away feeling persuaded that she had withdrawn her request of her own accord.

Miss Freeman's marriage to Professor Palmer

withdrew her from the ranks only in part. She ceased to be connected with Wellesley, but her interest in the large educational work in the country continued. She entered at this time on a new period of personal service, and in writing and public speaking she reached audiences larger than the she had met in the college chapel. As a public speaker she was vivid, magnetic and eloquent. Her voice possessed rich cadences and penetrated wherever it came to the remotest corner of a large auditorium. A winning dignity was her unconscious charm. The platform lost one of its principal ornaments when Mrs. Palmer was called hence. Perhaps I can but give a glimpse of her home side by quoting in part a letter sent to a friend who was bringing to a house party of girls. "We shall expect you on Saturday afternoon. Dear me! I wish the hours were not so little. Two rooms are hardly large enough for seven Wellesley girls. But my heart is large enough, and I want them all for Sunday. They will give me time at least for seven good talks. Ah, what a glorious set of girls it is, as you name them over, every one of them! This week the cook has been on a vacation, though she will be here when you arrive. But you should have tasted the new things I have cooked. G. says my bread is the best he has ever eaten, and my currant jelly preserves are beautiful to behold. How you will enjoy the fragrant haying and the cardinal flowers in the Run!"

As hostess and housekeeper Mrs. Palmer was the peer of her most shining contemporaries. Her versatility is again shown in the following exquisite poem:

THE TEMPEST

He shall give his angels charge
Over thee in all thy ways.
Though the thunders roam at large,
Though the lightning round me plays,
Like a child I lay my head
In sweet sleep upon my bed.

Though the terror come so close,
It shall have no power to smite;
It shall deepen my repose,
Turn the darkness into light.
Touch of angels' hands is sweet;
Not a stone shall hurt my feet.

All thy waves and billows go
Over me to press me down.
Into arms so strong, I know
They will never let me drown.
Ah, my God, how good thy will!
I will nestle and be still.

The last books that interested Mrs. Palmer were read to her by her husband. They were Jesus' Way by President Hyde of Bowdoin College, and Quiller Couch's Oxford Book of Poetry. She was then ill, and after several consultations eminent surgeons declared that her only chance for recovery lay in a critical operation. They did not conceal from husband and wife the fact that it might be fatal. With the utmost courage and confidence Mrs. Palmer quickly made every preparation that was needful. She gave her husband directions with regard to the notification of those for whom she had promised to speak in the ensuing winter. She sent messages to personal friends and relatives, and talked with him about what might be his lonely future. She lived long enough after the operation to talk with him again with the old sweetness, although painfully weak, but it was God's way to take her to himself. She made a brave fight and would have lived if she could, but Professor Palmer tersely says that it was in keeping with her character that she made at last a brief business of dying. Such women as she do not die. She lives in her work, in the character and influence of her Wellesley students, repeated indefinitely in lives and homes and work around the globe, and she lives, too, in this remarkable biography, which must take its place on the shelves with permanent literature.

Always Better than Advertised

The Bible Dictionary came duly to hand and am more than pleased. I have several of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD premiums and have always found them better than expected. I am especially proud of this one and will certainly show it to my friends.

VERNE L. BURR.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Our Charge*

THE character of Timothy is made most winning in Paul's epistles to him. He was the child and the grandchild of godly women, and from a babe he had known the sacred writings. He was modest—so modest that he had to be urged to greater self-confidence. He was young. One might almost imagine that the famous picture of Christ in the temple would look also something like Timothy. "My child," Paul repeatedly calls him. Like Samuel, he is lovely and beloved, eloquent and noble child of the Spirit. The great charge given to him should especially appeal to the young everywhere.

Timothy has grown to manhood, but he is still "a child of God," pure, high-minded, devoted. The love borne him by the older and greater apostle is as loyal and unselfish as that of David for Jonathan.

"I long to see thee . . . that I may be filled with joy." "Come shortly unto me." "Come before winter." "My beloved child . . . how increasing is my remembrance of thee!" Was ever love more beautifully and sincerely expressed?

Out of such warm and fatherly affection, it is natural that the most spontaneous and eloquent yearnings should arise. This is the reason why, in all Paul's epistles, there occurs no more passionate word than in these two to Timothy. There is scarcely a sentence which is not freighted with depth of emotion and tenderness such as men feel only in their profoundest moments.

We thrill as we read them, and as Paul agonized for the purity and wisdom and success of this gifted young disciple, so we are inspired to agonize for equal blessings for ourselves and our loved ones.

"Be diligent." "Give thyself wholly." "Take heed." "Continue."

These exhortations are fraught with every anguish. Paul knew full well the slippery paths of youth. He realized the temptations which lay in wait for this beautiful and highly endowed youth. "Be thou an ensample . . . in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity," and "fight the good fight," "guard that which is committed unto thee," "be instant in season, out of season."

Thus came the war-summons to Timothy, and not less strenuously it sounds in the ears of the youth of today. He fights the same fiends that Timothy fought, and his strength must come from the same source. Human nature is the same to-day as in Paul's time, but God, thanks be to his name, is the same also, and an ever-present help.

Our charge is to this hard duty of labor and striving, the setting of a brave, clean example, the necessity to progress in the Christian life, that "it may be manifest to all."

Otherwise, we shall not be ready when the Son of Man calleth. Watch—be at the post of duty—for ye know not on what day your Lord cometh.

It is said that at the battle of Presburg, the chief of the clan McGregor fell, covered with wounds. His men wavered. Their leader was helpless, and they were about to retreat, when the old man raised himself upon his elbow, while the blood gushed from his wounds, and said, "I am not dead, my children. I am looking to see you to your duty."

Instantly they formed anew and returned to the charge.

We, too, are under the eye of our leader. He is following our efforts, with even more of love and desire for our success than Paul felt for Timothy, but it is his will, mysterious though it seems, that we should work out our own salvation.

Thus comes this strong message to every one who would wish to be found ready at his Lord's appearing.

Living With God*

OCCASIONALLY one meets a saintly man or woman, whose face and bearing proclaim an inner life which is not of this world. Such an one is calm under adversity, steadfast to duty, not easily provoked, thinketh no evil. You see him always in his place and at the right time in the church, in the prayer-meeting, at his shop or office; and ever upon his face is the unmistakable seal of what some one has called "other-worldliness."

Looking upon him you have said, "Oh, if I could but so control myself! If I could but bear the slights and blows of life without the irritation that comes to me! If I could but wear upon my face that beautiful peace!"

And yet over and over again in the Scriptures, both the old and the new, occurs the promise that we may find God anywhere at any time—that we are in his presence constantly—and that if we will but let him abide in us, perfect peace will be given unto us.

This great truth belongs to the old, first preaching. Even in the time of Paul, already he seems to be sure that there are at least seven men, "of good report, full of the Spirit," who could be appointed to "serve tables." Yet some of the newer sects are advancing this thought as though it were but just discovered. Shame upon us Christians, that we have not better shown forth our Lord! His Spirit abiding in us, should set its gentle mark upon our faces, and should ennoble every act—and yet there are many who affirm that another revelation was necessary before this peace and joy could be given us.

As a seed in the soil, so upon our conversion is the Spirit within us. As the tree bursts from the seed, so the Spirit groweth in the soul. "If it is not growing," says Kingsley, "it is dying; if it is not getting better, it is getting worse. As the tree dies unless it grows, so our souls must die unless they grow. Consider that!"

Spurgeon compares this spiritual growth to flying. The soul can at first take but short flights, but as its wings strengthen, it "rises above the world, and leaves behind its cares and its wants, with the wings of faith and love."

This, Spurgeon calls "a miracle," yet it is one which every Christian should experience. It is promised to him. He should insist upon it, in prayer which will not let God go, until he gives the blessing.

It was observed that an infidel mill-owner, who ran his mill on Sundays as well as week-days, stopped it for a while during every Sunday morning, and again Sunday noon. Some one asked why he did this. "Oh," he replied, "it is because I know Deacon B. will pass at a certain time on his way to church, and again on his way back. I don't mind the rest of you, who don't half live what you profess, but I do mind him, and it makes me feel bad here"—putting his hand upon his heart—"to run my mill while he is passing."

It is a part of the religion of the theosophists and certain other Oriental sects, that the spirit within him forms a visible aura around each individual. The experience of the mill-owner and the good deacon indicates that the spirit of every Christian is far more discernible to others than we sometimes think. "The mind of the spirit is life and peace," says the great apostle, and "life and peace" will show in the countenance and cannot be hid.

It is notable that Paul dwells, in his great enumeration of spiritual gifts (I. Cor. 8-12), upon the fact that men, even Christians, are diversely endowed. Some—not all—can work miracles. Some—not all—have "gifts of healing." But all have the same spirit, and may dwell daily in "the secret place of the Most High."

Saul and Jonathan Slain

By MRS. M. BAXTER

SAUL'S career became more and more sad. After the Lord departed from him, the rejected king made the most desperate attempt to recover his popularity and his influence over his people, but in his disobedience he had brought upon him the curse of the broken law. There was a blight upon Saul's whole life; it was an endless strife against God, and all things seemed to be against him. He sought of the witch of Endor light upon the future; but it brought no hope to the miserable man.

Saul was leading a life independent of God. Could not Saul have been restored? Surely yes. "If the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live." But Saul did not turn; his was one career of self-seeking, self-love, self-pity, self-help, and, finally, self-destruction.

While we are on earth, in our short life of preparation for heaven, God bears with much that opposes him for the sake of the discipline it is to his children; but when once it has done its work, it is removed, and the scene of trial changes—other lessons have to be learned. In future, David's trials were to come more from within than from without.

The trials of God's children narrow more and more, and intensify more and more; the conflict with the world is a very outside one, and, with really devoted souls, a very short one. Then comes the conflict with the flesh, the "I" and the "me," the likes and dislikes, the tastes, choices, and reasonings, until the will, reason, and the affections are all, one after another, brought into obedience to Christ. Then another conflict begins, and the battleground is the "heavenly places" where the evil one brings up his hosts of principalities and powers.

The Philistines fought against Israel, and now Israel fled, "and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa." The chief prize which the Philistines sought was the family of Saul. The beloved, the brave, the faithful Jonathan was their first victim; then Abinadab and Melchishua, two other sons of Saul, were slain; last of all, Saul himself was wounded. Oh, the despair which must have seized this man—once, in a certain measure, acquainted with God, once having known what it was to have the Spirit of God, and now, in his most critical moment, to have to face a lost eternity alone! He called to his armor-bearer to complete the work of death, and slay him, but his armor-bearer was afraid. "Therefore Saul took a sword and fell upon it."

Later, a man made his appearance before David, with every sign of the deepest mourning, to announce the death of Saul. David was anxious to hear tidings of the battle, but the news was sad—many of the people had fled, many were fallen, and Jonathan and King Saul among the number. David "took hold on his clothes, and rent them," and showed every sign of grief.

Meanwhile, the Philistines, with barbarous animosity, had decapitated Saul, and fastened his body and his sons' bodies to the wall of Bethshan, which literally signifies "the house of rest." There is no rest while self lives, and the death place of self is the place of rest in the Lord. The men of Jabesh Gilead came with valiant men and rescued their bones, and buried them.

A Church of the Rich*

"LET us hear what the pastor himself has to say," suggested Hocking. "I've very little to say," replied Gaunt, "and I'm not sure that I can say it without giving offense. What has impressed me most to-night is that you all seem to accept defeat as if it were irreparable. I have listened in vain for the note of courage. I may as well let you know at once that I am not of that spirit. I am going on. It's not a time for economy, but generosity. Wise generals don't reduce their forces in the face of the enemy. No doubt we have lost some of our best members. We all know why. They have migrated to the suburbs. But there are more people living at the very doors of the church than there were seven years ago when I commenced my ministry. I propose to get those people."

"We don't want them," interrupted an old deacon named Small. "They are not our kind of folk. They wouldn't mix."

"They are people, at all events," said Gaunt, with a grave smile. "It may be a misfortune that the church is situated among them, but since it is, the church ought to exist for them more than for anybody else."

"That's very well in sentiment, no doubt," retorted the old deacon. "But it won't work. This has always been a church of the rich, and if it changes its character there are many of us that won't wish to stay in it."

Gaunt had it on his tongue to say, "Then let the rich support it," but he was restrained by the recollection of his own attitude of mind in previous years. How often had he been pleased to hear the church described as a church of the rich! He had boasted of it, not in a vain or sordid way it is true; but he had boasted. It had seemed to him a matter of legitimate pride that his influence had been exerted over rich men. Of course he had done nothing to discourage the poor from attending his ministrations, but he had not wanted them, or sought them, or, indeed, thought much about them. To influence the rich, to attract the men of means, to direct their generousities—was not that, after all, the best way to serve the poor? So he had argued a hundred times. Because he had so argued his tongue was now tied. And yet for a vivid moment he now saw a vision of the poor—the struggling multitude with their pathetic pretence of competence, the daily workers crowded in narrow rooms, the heroic silent throng of uncomplaining lives around him, and he felt the pathos of their lot.

But they "wouldn't mix." Well, was the sentiment, however offensive it sounded, so far from the truth?

Hymn to Save a Panic†

IF BEHIND the ice were wind as well as current, the ship wouldn't live an hour. Steadily the girl played on. Wasn't the onslaught of the ice heavier than last time? Was the wind rising then? headly eloquence never a word. Others here that Hildegard had seen night after night, gambling, drinking, quarreling—and now . . . !

These rude fellow-creatures, little admirable as they might show themselves in happier hours, wore something very like dignity to-night. How still they were! It did not escape Hildegard that all these many pairs of eyes were either lowered or fixed on space, as if each one forebore to read in his fellow's face confirmation of his own grim knowledge. Each avoiding the other's eyes, they stood there listening to those sounds the puny piano was ineffectual to drown—the crash of impact and the yet more horrible crunching, vicious and prolonged, as though man's arch-enemy of the deep, after battering vainly for admission, would gnaw his admission to this strange concert on the beleaguered bar. While the nerves of the people still vibrated under the bombardment, some one started "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Strangest of all on that strange evening was the revelation that in this particular company hardly one but seemed to know the hymn, and few that were not singing it with abandon to the thunderous bass of the ice. Whatever your own thoughts might be, you read in more than one of these faces that of a certainty God was "nearer" this night than he had often been before. At the beginning of the last verse, the loudest crash of all, as if a hundred tons of iron had been hurled at the Los Angeles. The people, led by one unfaltering voice, kept on singing. Only Hildegard's flying fingers stumbled as the ship shrank and cowered under the blow.

Gospel Progress in China

IN A LETTER from Rev. William P. Chalfant, Presbyterian missionary at Ichowfu, Shantung, China, to Mr. J. C. Havemeyer, New York, the writer says:

"I have made several tours through the country and met with much encouragement. I have just returned from a circuit of nearly 200 miles (by barrow), in the course of which I examined thirty-three candidates for baptism and baptized seven, and last Sunday we had our quarterly communion here in the city and examined thirteen candidates, receiving seven to communion."

"By far the most encouraging part of our Shantung field just now is that about the large city of Tsiningchow, four days' journey west of here. There they have received 200 persons to communion since last October, an increase of almost fifty per cent. Our average rate of increase all over the field is ten per cent. Even that is far above the rate prevailing at home."

"At the city of Chuchow I found that a whole family of our Christians had gone to the Roman Catholics because our evangelists refused to take up a certain lawsuit for them. The Catholics are, I am sorry to say, not at all careful about this matter and are constantly interfering in the civil courts. It is our invariable rule to keep out of such matters unless it is clearly shown that it is a case of persecution."

"After several years of freedom from such cases we are at this moment involved in just such a matter. One of our Christians is operating a coal mine southwest of the city and has been making some money. A mischief maker at the mines evolved a scheme to make him suffer loss. He brought a Buddhist priest and insisted that the Christian should contribute one hundred Mexican dollars toward the rebuilding of a temple. The Christian explained that he could not give money for that purpose and the men went away and hatched up a conspiracy to accuse him of encroaching upon the mine of a neighboring operator. He was taken before the local magistrate and beaten 600 blows with the bamboo besides being fined nearly 1,000 Mexican dollars. The Christians are very much stirred up, for several of them are in business, and if it be found by their enemies that they can be imposed upon with impunity in this way, there will be no end of such troubles. We are trying to have the official make some just settlement of the matter. The trouble is that he is expecting a large bribe (so it is said) from the other side and at the same time gets the heavy fine imposed upon the Christian. This is a specimen of the peculiar trials to which our people are exposed. Of course, we point out to them that they are Chinese subjects and must abide by the decisions of their own magistrates; but they know perfectly well that the officials will listen to representations from us, because they are afraid we may appeal to the foreign consul to preserve our treaty rights. Knowing this, the Christians think that if we do not do something to help them, we are indifferent to their interests, and all our talk about love and mutual helpfulness is empty words. It is very hard to know just how far to go and what to say. They cannot understand our scruples on the score of international law, or our legal status as citizens of an alien power."

"We are having the pleasure of entertaining in our home my old friend and colleague, the Rev. Charles Killie, now stationed at Pao-Ting-Fu, the capital of Chih-li Province. He and his wife left here nine years ago. He notices many changes and we have much to talk over. It is rarely that we have a guest at our isolated station. Mr. Killie has made a five days' journey by mule-litter to visit us and we keenly enjoy the occasion. COFFEE THE CAUSE

Of Various Ailments

It does not require a scientist to discover if coffee is harmful.

Plain common sense and the simple of looking for the cause of things, so reveals coffee in its true light—that of a forming drug.

"My family on both sides were coffee toppers," writes a Penna. painter, "and we suffered from nervousness, headache, sleeplessness, dizziness, and palpitation of the heart."

"Medical treatment never seemed to do any permanent good. I thought there must be some cause for these troubles and I did not find it was coffee until I was forty."

"Hearing of the benefit that many have derived from changing to Postum, I quit coffee and used Postum entirely. Now I am a new man."

"I sleep well, can eat three good meals a day, have no headache nor palpitation, no nerve twitching in my face, and I don't have to pay out hard-earned money for medicines."

"I believe a good hot cup of Postum, strong, with half milk and taken before going to bed at night, is the best thing to keep a painter from having lead poisoning. It's my experience, anyway."

"There's a reason."

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 17—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Word-Building

IN THE use of English one who "coins words," unless he be an acknowledged authority, is considered a charlatan, but this is not so in Esperanto. On the contrary, the more words one can make the better, if made from roots according to fixed rules. Indeed, the possibility of word-building is named among the advantages of Esperanto as making it possible to acquire a large vocabulary without memorizing. In the standard book on Esperanto, the Krestomatio, edited by Dr. Zamenhof, the author of Esperanto, a list of fifty-two words is given developed by him from the root ak. It is proposed in this lesson to show how word-building is done, and in the next lesson to give Dr. Zamenhof's list, which could certainly not be understood without some preliminary work. There are about forty suffixes and twelve prefixes that are used in word-building, which will now be given as briefly as possible, part in this lesson, and part in the next two.

Suffixes

AD shows an action continued: kanto, singing; kantado, singing. ART may be used in a similar way: kantarto, the art of singing.
IS, something made from: ovo, egg; ujo, omelet; amiko, friend; amikaĵo, a friendly act.
EC denotes an abstract quality: riĉa, rich; riĉeco, wealth.
AN, IST, ESTR, UL. These four suffixes relate to individuals. AN refers to a member of something, or a citizen: ĉiĉo, city; urbano, a citizen; Kristo, Christ; Kristano, a Christian. IST signifies a person following a profession or trade: pentri, to paint; pentristo, a painter. ESTR signifies a chief, leader, ruler, principal: urbo, city; urbestro, mayor; ŝipo, ship; ŝipestro, captain. UL denotes one remarkable for a given quality: bela, beautiful; belulino, a beautiful woman; juna, young; junulo, a youth; tiam, then; tiamulo, a man of that time, contemporary; kun, with; kunulo, a companion.
AR and ER: aro, a collection; ero, one of many objects; vorto, word, vocabulary; ĥajlo, hail; ĥajlero, a hail-storm; ŝafo, a sheep; ŝafaro, a flock of sheep; sukero, sugar; sukerero, a lump of sugar.
OJ and NJ are affectionate diminutives to apply, the first to the name of a man, and the second to the name of a woman: Johano, John; Johanĉjo, Johnny; patro, father; paĉjo, papa; Mario, Mary; Marinjo, Molly; patrino, mother; panjo, mamma.

EBL, EM, IND. Ebl denotes possibility: fidi, to rely upon; fidebla, reliable. EM signifies tendency, inclination: dormi, to sleep; dormema, drowsy. IND, deserving; laŭdi, to praise; laŭdinda, praiseworthy.

EDZ denotes a married person, used rather as a root than a suffix: edzo, husband; edzino, wife; edzeco, matrimony.

EG, ET. EG denotes increase; ET, decrease: monto, mountain; montego, a large mountain; monteto, a hill.

EJ, ING, UJ. "These three suffixes are related, because they denote either a place or thing from which the idea of the root is produced, or in which it is contained" (Cox): preĝi, to pray; preĝejo, church; vinbero, grape; vinberujo, vineyard; kandelo, candle; kandelujo, candlestick; inko, ink; inkujo, inkstand; Italo, an Italian; Italujo, Italy; ĉerizo, cherry; ĉerizujo, cherrytree; kaŝtano, chestnut; kaŝtanujo, chestnut tree; papero, paper; paperojo, a portfolio.

ID, young of, or a descendant: hundo, dog; hundido, puppy; Izraelo, Israel; Izraelido, an Israelite.

IG, IG, the two most important of all suffixes, because they are applicable to verbs, adjectives, nouns and prepositions. They also determine whether a verb is transitive or intransitive: igi, to make, to cause; igi, to become; sanigi, to make healthy; sanigi, to become healthy; bona, good; bonigi, to make good; bonigi, to become good; skribisto, a writer; skribistigi, to make a writer; skribistigi, to become a writer; igi, to make; forigi, to make away with; forigi, to withdraw.

Exercise

Root san, health: saneco, sanulo, sanejo, sanigi, sanigi. Root libr, book: librejo, libristo, libreto, libraro, librego. Root lign, wood: lignisto, lignaro, lignajisto, lignaĵo. Root flug, fly: flugi, flugigi, for-flugi. Root flor, flower: floro, floristo, ekflori, florejo. Root juĝ, to judge: juĝo, juĝisto, juĝistaro, juĝejo. Root orf, orphan: orfo, orfino, orfecoj, orfeĝi. Root sonor, ring (sound): sonorilo (bell), sonorileto, sonorigu, sonorigi. Root skulpt, to sculpture: skulptado, skulptisto, skulptaĵo. Root vid, to see: vidado, vidaĵo, vidigi, videbla, vindinda. Root trankvil, calm: trankvileco, trankviliĝi, trankviliĝi. Root sag, wise: sageco, sagulo, saginda, sagiĝi. Root port, to carry: portado, portaĵo, portanto, portisto.

Word-building to be continued in the next lesson.

PNEUMONIA'S DEADLY SWEEP

IN FEBRUARY, 1908, a leading Life Insurance Company paid more death claims from pneumonia than from any other disease, except consumption. Through the kindness of Congressman Perry, I received from the Department of Commerce and Labor the mortality statistics for 1906, and I find that there were 61,077 deaths from pneumonia in the registration area, which contains about 41,000,000 people, but I do not know how many deaths there were in the 40,000,000 outside the registration area; however, it is very apparent that special efforts are wanted to try and discover a more successful method of treating pneumonia, and perhaps John Pierpont Morgan would help this object, as Henry Phipps recently gave $750,000 to Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, to establish a professorship of psychiatry, and a hospital building, and Dr. A. Meyer, President of New York Psychiatric Society, has been appointed to the professorship of psychiatry, which Webster's Dictionary states is "The application of the healing art to mental diseases;" but we certainly want to know better how to apply the healing art to pneumonia, or the medical profession appears to be helpless to combat certain forms or stages of the disease.

In Los Angeles, Cal., in May, 1908, in a population of 275,000, including many invalids, there were thirteen deaths from pneumonia and bronchopneumonia of people over one year old, and four of these were from the Atlantic States, and nine were foreign born. In the terrible climate of New York, in 1907, there were 11,806 deaths from pneumonia and bronchopneumonia alone. GEO. BRERETON.

FRIENDLY TIP

Restored Hope and Confidence.

After several years of indigestion and its attendant evil influence on the mind, it is not very surprising that one family loses faith in things generally.

A N.Y. woman writes an interesting letter. She says:

"Three years ago I suffered from an attack of peritonitis which left me in a most miserable condition. For over two years I suffered from nervousness, weak heart, shortness of breath, could not sleep, etc.

"My appetite was ravenous, but I felt starved all the time. I had plenty of food, but it did not nourish me because of intestinal indigestion. Medical treatment did not seem to help. I got discouraged, stopped medicine and did not care much whether I lived or died.

"One day a friend asked me why I didn't try Grape-Nuts, stop drinking coffee and use Postum. I had lost faith in everything, but to please my friends I began to use both and soon became very fond of them.

"It wasn't long before I got some strength, felt a decided change in my system, hope sprang up in my heart and slowly but surely I got better. I could sleep very well, the constant craving for food ceased and I have better health now than before the attack of peritonitis.

"My husband and I are still using Grape-Nuts and Postum." "There's a Reason."

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend.

BY WAY of defense against these possibilities Margaret now adopted a playful air and fell to calling Ned the name by which he had introduced himself on that first day when she had seen him at the head of the hillside path—"Uncle Ned." She did not do this many times, however, for one day he turned upon her a white face, working with emotion.

"I am not your uncle," he burst out; and Margaret scarcely knew whether to laugh or to cry, he threw so much tragedy into the simple words.

"No?" she managed to return lightly. "Oh, but you said you were, you know; and when a man says—"

"But I say otherwise now," he cut in, leaning toward her until his breath stirred the hair at her temples. "Margaret," he murmured tremulously, "it's not 'uncle'—but there's something else—a name that—"

"Oh, but I couldn't learn another," interrupted Margaret with nervous precipitation, as she rose hurriedly to her feet, "so soon as this, you know! Why, you've just cast me off as a niece, and it takes time for me to realize the full force of that blow," she finished gaily, as she hurried away.

In her own room she drew a deep breath of relief; but all day, and for many days she was haunted by the hurt look in Ned's eyes as she had turned away. It reminded her of the expression she had seen once in the pictured eyes of a dog that had been painted by a great artist. She remembered, too, the title of the picture: "Wounded in the house of his friends," and it distressed her not a little. And yet—Ned was her comrade and her very good friend; and that was what he must be.

It was not only this, however, that caused Margaret restless days and troubled nights; there were those children down in the mills—those little children, nine, ten, twelve years old. It was too cold now to stay long on the veranda, but there was many a day, and there were some nights, when Margaret looked out of the east windows of Belcourt and gazed with fascinated yet shrinking eyes at the mills.

She was growing morbid—she owned that to herself. She knew nothing at all of the mills, and she had never seen a child at work in them; yet she pictured great wheels relentlessly crushing out young lives, and she recoiled from the touch of the shimmering folds of her trailing silks—they seemed alive with shrunken little forms and wasted fingers. Day after day she turned over in her mind the most visionary projects for stopping those wheels, or for removing those children beyond their reach. Even though her eyes might be on the merry throng of a gay city street, her thoughts were still back in the mill town with the children; and even though her body might be flying from home at the rate of thirty miles an hour in Frank's big six-cylinder "Speeder," her real self was back at Belcourt with the mills always in sight.

Once again she appealed to her guardian, but five minutes' talk showed her the uselessness of anything she could say—it was true, she did not know anything about it.

It was that very fact, perhaps, which first sent her thoughts in a new direction. If, as was true, she did not know anything about it, how better could she remedy the situation than by finding out something about it? And almost instantly came the memory of her guardian's words: "I suppose that that altogether too officious young McGinnis has been asking your help for some of his schemes."

Bobby knew! Bobby had schemes. Bobby was the one to help her. By all means she would send for Bobby.

That night, in a cramped little room in one of the mill boarding houses, a square-jawed, gray-eyed young man received a note that sent the blood in a tide of red to his face, and made his hands shake until the paper in his long, sinewy fingers fluttered like an aspen leaf in a breeze. Yet the note was very simple. It read:

"Will you come, please, to see me to-morrow night? I want to ask you some questions about the children at the mills."

And it was signed, "Margaret Kendall."

CHAPTER XXVII

WITH a relief which she did not attempt to hide from herself, Margaret saw the male members of the family at Belcourt leave early the next morning on a trip from which they could not return until the next day; and with a reluctance which she could not hide from either herself or Mrs. Merideth, she said that afternoon:

"Mr. McGinnis is coming to see me this evening, Aunt Della. I sent for him. You know I am interested in the children at the mills, and I wanted to ask him some questions."

Mrs. Merideth was dumb with dismay. For some days Margaret's apparent inactivity had lulled her into a feeling of security. And now, with her brothers away, the blow which they had so dreaded for weeks had fallen—McGinnis was coming. Summoning all her strength, Mrs. Merideth managed to murmur a faint remonstrance that Margaret should

A Special Offer to Every Reader

The tremendous increase in the price of lumber in the last few years has made shingles entirely out of the question most farm buildings.

In order that every reader of this paper may become familiar with a roofing which is very much better than shingles and rapidly taking their place, the Barr Manufacturing Company, who are largest manufacturers of roofing in the world, have offered to send free a sample of their Amatite Roofing to every reader of this paper.

The feature of this roofing is a mineral surface on top, which not only makes coating and painting unnecessary but is a splendid fire-retardant. Of course every farmer will appreciate the fact that by doing away with painting and coating it will save time, money, and at the same time will make repairs unnecessary.

We suggest that every reader write once for a free sample and illustrated booklet. Few things are more important to the farmer than a good tight roof, a leaky one is an abomination and is a cause of losses and sickness.

The request for sample should be addressed to the Barrett Manufacturing Company at New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Pittsburg, Kansas City, New Orleans or Minneapolis.

trouble herself over a matter that could not be helped; then, with an earnest request that Margaret should not commit herself to any foolish promises, she fled to her own room, fearful lest, in her perturbation, she should say something which she would afterward regret.

When Miss Kendall came down stairs at eight o'clock that night, she found waiting for her in the drawing-room—in which McGinnis had been shown by her express orders—a young man whose dress, attitude and expression related impersonality and business, in spite of his sumptuous surroundings.

In directing that the young man should be shown into the drawing-room instead of into the more informal library or living-room, Margaret had vaguely intended to convey to him the impression that he was a highly-prized friend, and as such was entitled to all honor; but she had scarcely looked into the cold gray eyes, or touched the half-reluctantly extended fingers before she knew that all such efforts had been without avail. The young man had not come to pay a visit; he was an employee who had obeyed the command of one in authority.

McGinnis stood just inside the door, hat in hand. His face was white, and his jaw stern-set. His manner was quiet, and his voice when he spoke was steady. There was nothing about him that told the girl—who was vainly trying to thaw the stiff frigidity of his reserve—that he had spent all day and all the night in lashing himself into just this manner that so displeased her.

"You sent for me?" he asked quietly. "Yes," smiled the girl. "And doesn't your conscience prick you, sir, because you had to send for me, when you should have come long ago of your own accord to see me?" she demanded playfully, motioning him to a seat. Then, before he could reply, she went on hurriedly. "I wanted to see you very much. By something that Mr. Spencer said the other evening I suspected that you were interested in the children who work in the mills—particularly interested. And—you are?"

"Yes; much interested." "And you know them—lots of them? You know their parents, and how they live?"

"Yes, I know them well—too well." He added the last softly—almost involuntarily.

The girl heard, and threw a quick look of sympathy into his eyes.

"Good! You are just the one I want, then," she cried. "And you will help me; won't you?"

McGinnis hesitated. An eager light had leaped to his eyes. For a moment he dared not speak lest his voice break through the lines of stern control he had set for it.

"I shall be glad to give you any help I can," he said at last, steadily; "but Mr. Spencer, of course, knows—" he paused, leaving his sentence unfinished.

"But that is exactly it," interposed Margaret, earnestly. "Mr. Spencer does not know—at least, he does not know personally about the mill people, I mean. He told me long ago that you stood between him and them, and had for a long time. It is you who must tell me."

"Very well, I will do my best. Just what—do you want to know?"

"Everything. And I want not only to be told, but to see for myself. I want you to take me through the mills, and afterward to some of the houses where the children live."

"Miss Kendall!" The distressed consternation in the man's voice was unmistakable.

"Is it so bad as that?" questioned the girl. "You don't want me to see all these things? All the more reason why I should, then! If conditions are bad, help is needed; but before help can be effectual, or even given at all, the conditions must be understood. That is what I mean to do—understand the conditions. How many children are there employed in the mills, please?"

McGinnis hesitated. "Well, there are some—hundreds," he acknowledged. "Of course many of them are twelve and fourteen and fifteen, and that is bad enough, but there are others—younger. You see the age limit in this State is lower than some. Many parents bring their children here to live, so that they may put them into the mills."

Margaret shuddered. "Then it is true, as Patty said. There are children there nine and ten years old!"

"Yes, younger than that, I fear. Only last week I turned away a man who brought a puny little thing with a request for work. He swore she was twelve. I'd hate to tell you how old—or rather, how young, she really looked. I sent him home with a few remarks which I hope he will remember. She was only one, however, out of many. I am not the only man at the mills. You must realize that."

"Yes, I realize it, and I understand why you can't always do what you wish. But just suppose you tell me now some of the things you would like to do—if you could." And she smiled encouragement straight into his eyes until in spite of his stern resolve he forgot himself and his surroundings, and began to talk.

Robert McGinnis was no silver-tongued orator, but he knew his subject, and his heart was in it. For long months he had been battling alone against the evils that had little by little filled his soul with horror. Accustomed heretofore only to rebuffs and angry denunciations of his "efficiency meddling," he now suddenly found a tenderly sympathetic ear eagerly awaiting his story.

No wonder McGinnis talked, and talked well. He seemed to be speaking to the Maggie of long ago—the little girl who stood ready and anxious to "divvy up" with all the world. Then suddenly his eyes fell on the rich folds of the girl's dress, and on the velvet pile of the rug beneath her feet.

"I have said too much," he broke off sharply, springing to his feet. "I forgot myself."

"On the contrary, you have not said half enough," declared the girl, rising too; "and I mean to go over to the mills at once, if you'll be so good as to take me. I'll let you know when. And come to see me again, please—without being sent for," she suggested merrily, adding with a pretty touch of earnestness: "We are a committee of two; and to do good work the committee must meet!"

McGinnis never knew exactly how he got home that night. The earth was beneath him, but he did not seem to touch it. The sky was above him—he was nearer that. But, in spite of this nearness, the stars seemed dim—he was thinking of glorious blue eyes.

McGinnis told himself that it was because of his mill people—this elation that possessed him. He was grateful that they had found a friend. He did not ask himself later whether it was also because of his mill people that he sat up until far into the morning, with his eyes dreamily fixed on the note in his hand signed, "Margaret Kendall."

Mrs. L. Turner, of Chicago, Ill., is another of the veteran subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, having had it as a daily visitor to her home for over twenty years. Mrs. Turner has been interested in all forms of Christian work for many years and greatly enjoys the reports of the world's upward progress as reported in the columns of this journal.

The National Dish

Van Camp's Pork and Beans may now be called the national dish.

They have given millions of homes, all over America, a new idea of what baked beans should be.

They have made beans a daily dish where they once were served weekly. And beans are 84% nutriment.

No housewife now serves home-baked beans after once serving Van Camp's. She objects to the labor of baking—her people object to the beans.

Home-baked beans are mushy and broken. Serve them with Van Camp's, and people won't eat them. They want their beans—as ours are—nutty, mealy and whole.

Home-baked beans are hard to digest. They ferment and form gas. That is because you apply, to most of the beans, less than half enough heat.

We bake in small parcels, and bake in live steam. The full heat of our ovens—245 degrees—gets to every bean. The result is, Van Camp's Beans digest.

Then we bake the pork, the beans and the tomato sauce together. People like that delicious blend.

Give any person a chance to choose and the choice will be Van Camp's.

Van Camp's pork and beans baked with tomato sauce

Don't try to serve another brand after once serving Van Camp's. The difference will be too conspicuous.

A part of the difference lies in the beans themselves. Sometimes we pay, for the beans used in Van Camp's, seven and eight times what other beans would cost.

But you get only the whitest and plumpest of Michigan beans in every can of Van Camp's.

Another difference is in the tomato sauce. We could buy tomato sauce, ready-made, for exactly one-fifth what ours costs.

But by using only whole, vine-ripened tomatoes we give to our sauce that superlative richness and zest.

The best beans are most economical. Your people will want them often, and the saving will show on your meat bills.

Please let them have what they want.

Prices: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

H. O., Overton, Neb. 1. What did Jesus mean in John 6:33? 2. What did Paul mean in II. Cor. 12:2, 3, 4? 3. Where did the idea originate that angels had wings?

1. If you compare verse 51, you will see that he did not refer to the gross idea which the bare terms of verse 53 might suggest, but he meant they must appropriate the spiritual sacrifice. He was to give his flesh for the (spiritual) life of the world, and unless men voluntarily appropriated to themselves this death in its sacrificial virtue, so that it might become the life and nourishment of their inner man, they would have no spiritual life at all. 2. This passage has already been explained in a recent issue. See THE MAIL-BAG. 3. See Exod. 25:20; 37:9; I. Kings 6:27; 8:6; Isa. 6:2; Ezek. 1:8; 10:16; Rev. 14:6 and similar passages. These gave the general impression, though there is no definite statement in the Scripture as to angels having wings.

Dr. G. W. Drake of Atlantic City, N. J., writes: "In a recent issue, the author of the article 'Mr. Bryant's Home Life,' in telling of Miss Grace Bryan, says: 'She was a pupil last year at Roanoke Seminary, at Roanoke, Va.' Miss Grace was a pupil last year at Hollins Institute, Va., and the preceding year. She was entered by her father during his travels in Europe."

Mrs. G. H. J., Rose, Okla. 1. Where do we find the fullest story of the seven devils cast from Mary Magdalene? 2. Explain "buried with Christ in baptism." 3. Does excessive sleep cause dullness?

1. Read Luke 8:2. The "seven devils" are "many sins," the number seven being typical of completeness. Among the legends preserved in connection with New Testament history is one which relates to the Magdalen. It is to the effect that her life was possessed by the "seven devils" of uncleanness; that she had fallen to the lowest depths of shame. On hearing of the Deliverer she came to him, repented and was forgiven and received among his followers. After his resurrection she lived a life of penitence and good works for thirty years. Another tradition says she died in Ephesus and was buried there. 2. Baptism is the burial of the old carnal life. The spirit of the ordinance is kept by affusion, as in colder countries, where immersion is not practised. 3. It is generally so considered, although there are people who require more sleep than others. This especially applies to the young.

Subscriber, Baltimore, Md. Does the Bible forbid second cousins to marry?

No; the Bible does not, and we know of no prohibition on the subject. In the old English Bibles there used to be printed on the fly-leaf a list of relationships to which, on account of consanguinity, marriage was forbidden; but this was simply an Anglican church ordinance, and not from the Scriptures. We believe that first cousins were among the number. The children of brothers and sisters are first cousins; the children of first cousins are second cousins.

J. A. J., Round Mountain, Calif. If a child has been baptized in the Methodist Episcopal Church in infancy, when grown would it be necessary, in order to join the church, to join first on the six months' probation, or can it be taken in without any preliminaries?

Up to the last Methodist General Conference, a term of six months' probation was necessary to full membership. Baptized children who had been put in a class and properly instructed by the pastor were eligible to church membership on the recommendation of the pastor and the Leaders' and Stewards' Meeting, without any formal joining of the church on probation and serving out the term. The last General Conference virtually abolished the six months' probation, if the pastor and members of the Quarterly Conference should see fit to receive persons into full fellowship at once.

C. M. Mills, Collinsville, Conn. In the State of Connecticut, is a girl legally of age at eighteen, or must she be twenty-one?

According to The American Encyclopedia of Law, a woman in Connecticut is not of age until she is twenty-one. If the matter involved is important, consult a Connecticut attorney. G. H. C.

M. P. R., Ash Brook, N. J. The natural consequence to the great publicity and sensation on the death of Mr. Marsh of Brooklyn, was the panic of "mad dog" and hydrophobia. I have known great suffering to be caused by this nervous fear and am anxious to do all in my power to quiet it. A man on our place was almost driven insane by nervous fright after being bitten by a well dog.

The writer encloses an article from a Philadelphia paper giving the views of several leading physicians, substantially to the effect that they have never seen a case of true hydrophobia, but they have encountered cases in which patients were suffering from so-called hydrophobia which was produced by fear or easily explainable from other causes. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in New York lately reported that its twenty-six employees were bitten about four times a month, and that in fourteen years they had been bitten some 15,000 times, yet not a single case of hydrophobia resulted.

Frank R., Vera, Tex. How do you reconcile Psalm 37:25 and Luke 16:20?

The better rendering of the Psalm is "utterly forsaken," and "begging bread continuously." David had, in his own destitution, begged bread from Nabab, but it was merely an incident. The very purpose of the Psalm is to counteract the temptation to fretfulness and doubt in the presence of temporary trouble, which comes to all of us at times.

G. G. W. S., North Tonawanda, N. Y. Would you advise a minister to play baseball with members of his congregation, or is it better for a minister to leave such sports alone?

There are some things which, though innocent enough in themselves, detract from the dignity and impair the influence of the ministerial calling. We think the present case is of this character.

Egyptians and Romans knew the art of producing colored glass. Pliny, in his Natural History, refers to the superimposition of one color upon another on glass and to the work of the glass engraver.

S. H. C., Saranac, Mich. 1. Is it true that England still holds landed estate within the boundaries of the United States, which has never been ceded to this Government? 2. Can I deed landed property to a missionary in Syria for her work in that country?

1. We know of no land in the United States which is owned by England or Great Britain. Probably Great Britain controls her ambassador's house in Washington, and she may even control property for her consuls in other cities. In such cases, however, the legal title is probably vested in some private individual or corporation. A letter to the Secretary of State at Washington will bring the information. 2. Yes, but the deed should be drawn by an attorney of the State where the land is situated. G. H. C.

V. M., Renton, Wash. Give some facts about the Bellerophon, the British man-of-war which carried Napoleon to his island prison in 1815.

She was a British cruiser, commanded by Captain Maitland, who took up his station at Rochefort before Napoleon's arrival. Maitland was visited by Savary and Las Casas, who negotiated in Napoleon's behalf and got a safe acceptance of a reasonable rate of interest for use of money employed in merchandise is where forbidden (See Matt. 25:27; Luke 19:27).

R. J. H., Rolla, Mo. 1. What is the best Commentary? 2. Are congregations in general decreasing? 3. Are open-air services detrimental or beneficial? 4. Are people usually urged at these services to take a stand for Christ?

1. There are several excellent Commentaries, the best being Jameson, Fausset & Brown's, a Professor Weiss. 2. We believe not. Owing the changes in local centres of population in large cities, some congregations decrease, but others in other localities are benefited. The only remedy for weak churches and small attendance to preach the Gospel, which always has the power to draw men. 3. They are of the greatest service in reaching the non-church-goers. You will find them frequently described in the pages of this journal. 4. Yes, if the services are of revival character.

M. G., Chicago, Ill. Will THE MAIL-BAG kindly tell me what the "seven deadly sins" are?

They are defined by the church of Rome as pride, anger, envy, sloth, lust, covetousness, and gluttony.

Mrs. M. S. B., Bowling Green, O. 1. What authority have the Catholics for claiming that the churches have portions of the true Cross? How can we know if our Bible is right as theirs wrong?

1. The various claims to the possession of portions of the "true Cross" have given rise to much controversy. None of these claims rests on satisfactory authority, and many of them are suspected of being pious tricks to deceive the credulous. 2. We would advise you to procure a copy of the Handbook of the Bible, published by Whittaker, New York, which will give you all the information concerning the authenticity of our Bible.

Reader, Harrison, O. How do we reconcile Exodus 33:11 and I. John 4:12?

"Face to face" is interpreted as meaning "presence to presence," in whatsoever form, audibly, freely, directly, and not in dream or vision but "as a man speaketh." This is fully confirmed in v. 20. It may have been a voice in the cloud. An especial revelation of God's glory was doubtless given to Moses, but it is useless to speculate on its actual character.

Miscellaneous

H. D. B., Stryker, O. We have already received the same statement from another reader.

Mrs. G. L., Fredericksburg, Pa. Voting should always be a matter of conscience. Certainly one should not vote against his own innate convictions.

O. T. B., Stillwater, N. Y. He was a sceptic and a freethinker, but he believed in a Supreme Being. As far as known, his views underwent no change before his death.

F. H. M., Red House, W. Va. There are still some parts of the world where the Gospel has not been preached, notably Tibet, and certain other parts of Asia, parts of Central Africa, etc.

W. M. P., Martinsville, Va. We think you were right in all you did, except that it would have been wiser not to have left your church. Reforms come from within oftener than from without, and the church needs all of its conscientious members. The outcome of the Southern temperance elections proves that your attitude was the right one.

G. D. T., Elroy, Wis. 1. Write to the Agricultural Department, Washington, D. C., about the Egyptian corn. The same kinds of grain are probably raised there to-day that were produced in Joseph's time. 2. The lesson implies that Lazarus, being bound in grave-clothes, found walking difficult. Jesus directed them to "loose him." His stumbling was not an indication of feebleness. When Christ gives blessing, he gives it to the full, to meet our requirements.

Reader, Calhoun, S. C. Capital punishment is a relic of barbarism. As the race advances in intelligence, the tendency to abolish the present method of taking life officially will increase. There is a growing recognition of the fact that criminals are largely the result of heredity and environment, and that society is, to a certain extent, responsible for these conditions. Write to Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, or to Harper & Brothers, New York, for the latest books on the subject.

Rev. Mr. Wilkinson Preaching to the "Bulls and Bears" in Wall Street

THE Rev. William Wilkinson, who has become known as the "Wall Street Evangelist," is one of the picturesque personalities of the open-air Gospel campaign in New York. His work is under the authority of the Evangelization Committee of Greater New York. He can be found there, the centre of an interested crowd, during even the hottest days, standing bareheaded and telling the old Gospel story of salvation to men from all walks of social, commercial, educational and religious life; bankers, brokers, railway men, bookkeepers, clerks, workingmen, lawyers and women.

C. A. W., San Diego, Calif. What is the duty of a church which knows for a certainty that a member will lie and deceive?

See Matt. 18:15-17, Gal. 6:1, and similar passages. Do not give way to the tendency toward undue severity. If God is willing to forgive even the worst of sinners, if repentant, we cannot justify a severe, unforgiving attitude toward a brother taken in a fault.

M. McK., New York. 1. In II. Chron. 3:9 we read that the weight of the nails was fifty shekels of gold. Then we read in another chapter that the sound of the hammer was not heard in the building of the temple. Please explain. 2. When and where was stained glass first brought into use?

1. The contradiction is only an apparent one. A subterranean quarry existed under Jerusalem (it has been rediscovered and explored in late years), where all the stone for the temple was hewn and dressed underground, and conveyed to the main building and placed in position, thus justifying the statement in I. Kings 6:7, since those in the city could hear no sound of the work, but viewed the temple as it grew noiselessly into grace and beauty. In these passages, the temple or main building is undoubtedly distinguished from the wings attached to it and the doors, etc. 2. Stained glass windows are said to have been first used in the eighth century. It is practically certain, however, that the ancient Assyrians, conduct for him to America, but Maitland said his orders were to prevent the Emperor's escape, and to take him to England, if possible. On July 13 he addressed a letter to the English Prince Regent, saying he wished to seek the hospitality of the English nation. On the 15th he went aboard the Bellerophon. On July 31 he was notified that he would not be landed in Britain but taken to St. Helena. He was transferred to the Northumberland, which sailed for the island on August 8.

A. M., Duluth, Minn. Are the taking of rent, interest and profit forbidden in the Bible? Did the Church oppose usury or interest for one thousand years or more?

Under the Mosaic law, the Israelites were forbidden to take usury from their brethren for the loan of money, food or anything else. Interest, however, was allowed to be taken from strangers. Grasping avarice and usury which would take advantage of the borrower's necessities are condemned (See Psalm 15:5; Jer. 15:10; Prov. 28:8; Lev. 25:36, 37; Ezekiel 18:8, 13, 17). Our Saviour denounced all extortion (See Luke 6:30, 35). It is quite true that the ancient Christian Church condemned usury. No usurer (money-lender) could be ordained. The practice was the subject of special condemnation in one of the canons of the Council of Nice, and this was confirmed and reiterated by the Councils of Eliberis, Arles, Carthage and others. SANKEY, PRINCE OF GOSPEL SINGERS

HIS LONG CAREER WITH MOODY, HIS GOSPEL TRIUMPHS, RETIREMENT, BLINDNESS AND DEATH

HERE was something more than usually tragic in the passing from earth of the two greatest Gospel evangelists of the last half century, Moody and Sankey. Moody was stricken down at the post of duty and called home in the very summit of his powers. Sankey, with a brave heart, took the burden of the work, and when even his stout frame gave way, he relinquished his task of singing and preaching the Gospel with reluctance. Feeble and blind, he was at last obliged to retire from the field of active service a few years ago. But although the voice which had thrilled multitudes was no longer heard in public, the tireless singer, while life remained, could not wholly forego his beloved art. God's praise had been his chief pleasure in living and it was now his solace in dying. With all the little strength that was left in him, he would sing in clear, though quavering, strains one of his own best known hymns with which his once glorious voice had often swayed vast audiences:

We shall know as we are known,
Never more to walk alone;
The dawning of the morning of that bright and happy day,
We shall know each other better, when the mists have rolled away.

This, his favorite air during his long years of blindness and waiting, was the last song upon his lips. He sang it shortly before he passed over triumphantly to the other side, where all is clear vision and the mists are forever rolled away.

Ira David Sankey was born in the year 1840 in the little town of Edinburg, Lawrence County, Pa. He was of Scotch-Irish ancestry. His father was a banker, editor, revenue collector and an active Methodist. Young Ira had excellent school training, and, while still a mere lad, became deeply interested in religious work. His conversion took place when he was seventeen. In 1861 he responded to the call for volunteers, and enlisted in the twelfth Pennsylvania Regiment. While in the army he kept up his religious work by organizing bivouac camp meetings and in other ways. When his time of service expired, he went into business as a collector for his father, but his interest in religious matters was so keen that he gave up much of his time to conventions and similar gatherings. Gifted with a fine voice, which had been enriched by cultivation, his services as a Gospel singer were in great demand in both Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Mr. Sankey's first meeting with Mr. Moody took place at Indianapolis in 1870, where the young singer was a delegate to the Y. M. C. A. Convention.

The singing, under some other leader, had been dull and uninspiring, and Sankey was asked to take charge of it. He did so, and the audience was so stirred up and brightened that Mr. Moody asked to be introduced to the singer. This was done and soon the two were in earnest conversation. "Well," said Moody after a pause, and holding Sankey's hand in his own, "you'll have to give up business." Sankey was amazed, but the great evangelist persisted. "You are the man I've been looking for the last eight years. I want you to come and help me in my work in Chicago."

Shortly afterward, the two were working together in the Western city, and this was the beginning of a spiritual life-partnership which brought innumerable souls into the Kingdom.

It was Moody's sagacious brain and keen eye that first foresaw the brilliant possibilities the future held for the young singer. Moody himself was not musical; he "couldn't raise a tune," no matter how simple the air. But he said:

I feel sure the great majority of people do like singing. It helps to build up an audience, even if you do preach a dry sermon. If you have singing that reaches the heart, it will fill the church every time. There is more said in the Bible about praise than prayer, and music and song have not only accompanied all Scripture revivals, but are essential in deepening spiritual life. We owe some of our best hymns to seasons when, in the family and church, in the factory and street, the great truths of the Gospel are heard in song. Singing does at least as much as preaching to impress the Word of God upon people's minds. Ever since God first called me, the importance of praise expressed in song has grown upon me.

Certainly the great evangelist's faith in the saving power of sacred song was abundantly justified by subsequent events. While Moody lived and was able to labor in the Gospel field, they were inseparable. Not only was Sankey a veritable prince of song and his own best accompanist, but he proved a prolific composer, his original work being of a character that instantly commended itself to religious audiences. "Give me but the germ of a song," he would say, "and it will grow of itself." He would constantly jot down new musical phrases of uplifting song as they occurred to him. He kept a scrap-book of his own compositions and others that he had found

TEXT—Psalm 31: 19, 20:

"Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee! Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence."

THE secret here referred to is the same mentioned by Paul a thousand years later in his letter to the Colossians, when he says, "Your life is hid with Christ in God." The old-time pagan religions had many mysteries, some of which, like those of Isis and Eleusis, have puzzled scholars to this day. Our religion has only one and this "an open secret," to wit, the Secret of the Presence of God.

We are hearing much about "The Practice of the Presence of God." The phrase is not new. It appears to have originated with one Nicholas of Lorraine, who, about two hundred years ago, wrote a little book entitled The Practice of the Presence. It was an epoch-making book, and this is the more remarkable since its author was no philosopher, nor even a moderately learned man, but a mere pastry-cook in one of the mansions of his time. He was, however, a mystic, who dreamed dreams and saw visions to some effect. He knew what it was, even as he stood among the rattling pans and kettles of that kitchen in Lorraine, to live as if his life were hid with Christ in God.

But words are nothing. What is this Secret of the Presence? As for God, in these days everybody believes in some sort of a God, but whether or no that belief is true to what some consider its root-meaning, by-lifian, i. e., something to live by, that is another matter.

Calling Upon God

There are some people who believe in an impersonal power which they call God.

They define it, and "it" is the proper pronoun to use in this connection, as Law, Life, a "Something not ourselves that makes for Righteousness," or the All-pervading Force of the universe. But to the average man there is no practical advantage in being held in the resistless grip of a machine that has no eyes to see, no heart to pity and no hands to help; and there would be a grim touch of humor in the suggestion that anybody should "practise the presence" of it.

There are others who talk about an "unknowable" God.

Personal he may be, though as agnostics they are unable to say so. In any case he is afar off. The Greeks sought him vainly, set up a Pantheon of idols along the way and ended their quest by erecting an altar "To an Unknown God." But this again is practically nothing to us; no more than is the atmosphere of Mars. There may be such a thing, but we are not definitely sure, and in any event we cannot breathe it.

There are others still who believe in an intermittent God, that is, one who manifests himself in spasmodic acts of providence.

If they are in trouble, they cry to him and he interposes; as he did in behalf of Joshua and his army, in the Valley of Ajalon. It is safe to say that, after their great deliverance on that occasion, the victors raised the anthem, "Our Fathers' God, to Thee, To Thee We Sing," and perhaps inscribed upon their coins the legend, "In God We Trust," and possibly when piping times of peace returned, the legend was forgotten and the song died out. The Greek dramatists were wont to say, "See that no god is called into your tragedy unless there be necessity for it." The average man is inclined to reason in the same way: "Ordinarily I can manage my own affairs; it is only when my foot-hold fails that I need to pray, 'Lord, save, I perish.' But as for constantly practising the Presence, I see no need of it."

An Abiding and Conscious Presence

But he who has learned this Secret never lets it go. The Presence is to him an Abiding Presence.

The holding of two interviews with God per diem is but the smallest part of it. To offer a prayer as one sets out along the day's untraversed paths and another at night-fall as he commits himself to the Unknown Land of Darkness is a confession of never having learned it. Two prayers a day! And what of the interim? If God be present at all he is present not now and then, in answer to an importunate cry for help, nor merely at stated seasons of worship in the closet and sanctuary, but night and day, summer and winter, year in and year out. As Jesus said, "Lo, I am with you alway."

And this Presence is also a Conscious Presence.

The man who hides in the Great Secret is aware of environment as really as if he were sheltered beneath the curtains of the King's tent. Can one then be always mindful of God? Surely. He may be absorbed in a thousand vexing cares, and still have, deep down in his sub-consciousness, the feeling, "God is with me." Is not the man who goes forth in the morning to his customary toil, mindful all day long of the gude wife who stood in the doorway to give him godspeed and who will be there again at evening to greet him? Her life is so interwoven with his being that the sense of her constantly nerves his heart and strengthens his arm. He need not be continually murmuring her name or renewing his espousal vows; it suffices that she is always with him; the day's work is pleasure because of her.

The Soul's Communion with God

And this Presence is also a Delectable Presence.

One who is on bad terms with God is naturally afraid to be with him; yet he knows that he cannot escape him. There is nothing truer than this: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in sheol, behold, thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, even the night shall be light about me, yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day, the darkness and the light are both alike to thee." But he who has discovered the Secret of God's Presence is not afraid of it. He hides in it, rather, and delights in it.

The experience referred to in the phrase, "Practising the Presence," begins at conversion.

For there is only one thing that can interrupt the happy communion of a soul with God, namely, sin. God hates sin with an utter hatred, he loathes and abhors it, and the sinner, knowing this, flees like recreant Jonah from the presence of the Lord. It is recorded of Adam that, in the time of his innocence in the garden of Eden, he walked and talked with God, but no sooner had he sinned than he "hid himself from the presence of the Lord among the trees of the garden; and the Lord called unto him, saying, Adam, where art thou? and he answered I was afraid and I hid myself." So sin cuts off our communion with God.

In conversion we are restored to that communion by the removal of our sins. We are cleansed at the "fountain filled with blood drawn from Emmanuel's veins." Our sins are remitted, blotted out, sunk in the depths of an unfathomable sea, and cast behind the back of God, so that he remembers them no more against us.

Influencing the Whole Life

This is conversion. Wherefore, the Gospel is called "the Gospel of Reconciliation." It removes the only obstacle to our fellowship with God; and it puts us in the way of Practising His Presence. The God who was justly offended by our sins is now made nigh in the person of Christ and is become Immanuel, that is, God with us. He who grasps the full significance of that fact will find that his whole life is tempered by it.

The sense of the abiding Presence leads inevitably to an avoidance of sin.

It makes us coy and tender to offend. For how can one indulge in deliberate sin when he knows that God is just beside him? And indeed God is always there, closer than seeing or touching, nearest and kindest of friends, ever walking with us.

I have an acquaintance who, years ago, contracted the opium habit, and it wrought such physical ravages that at length its discontinuance became a matter of life or death. He employed three nurses to serve in relays of eight hours each, and be with him constantly night and day. They were never to leave him for a moment, under any circumstances, lest he should break through his resolution and disannul what was now the desperate purpose of his life. And he thus succeeded in freeing himself from the awful spell. That is precisely what the perpetual sense of God's presence would do for every one of us. For, indeed, we never sin except when we shake him off. We cannot touch the unclean thing unless we willfully rid ourselves of God's sensible presence.

In that secret we are, furthermore, equipped for the discharge of duty.

The man who, bearing the name of Christ, stands idle in the market-place, would straightway address himself to the business in hand, were he to see his Lord beside him, sickle in hand, pointing to the yellow harvest field.

A few miles out of Rome on the Appian Way stands a little church called "Domine, Quo Vadis," that is, "Lord, whither goest thou?" The story runs that in a time of persecution Peter, overcome by fear, fled from the obligations of his parish in Rome. As he was hastening along the Appian Way, he met his Lord at this place, with his face turned toward the city. "Lord, whither goest thou?" cried Peter. He answered, "I go to Rome to be crucified again for thee!" Need it be said that Peter retraced his steps?

Oh, the shame of indolence, in the light of the fact of our busy Lord, who said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work!" To keep company with him is to address ourselves with scrupulous care to every task. The cook in the kitchen at Lorraine filled, it is true, but a humble sphere of usefulness; yet though it were but to turn the spit or kindle the fire he did it as Practising the Presence of God.

A servant with that clause

Makes drudgery divine;

Who sweeps the room as to God's laws,

Makes that and th' action fine.

And the sense of the abiding Presence stimulates us, also, to the building of character.

For Christ, who is God manifest and present with us, is our Exemplar. We cannot look at him without striving to be like him. We cannot see the manner of his walk and conversation without being moved to "covet the best things."

Growing in Christlikeness

It is a common saying that those who live much together grow to resemble one another. A man and wife, like Darby and Joan, as the years pass, borrow each other's smiles and attitudes. The soldiers in the army of Henry of Navarre, moved by admiration for their great captain, placed white plumes in their hats and wore their swords as he wore his. A like result must follow in the case of Christians who abide in the fellowship of their Lord. Their ambition is to measure up to him, that they may attain unto the fulness of a stature of a man.

My dear Redeemer and my Lord,

I read my duty in thy word;

But in thy life the Law appears

Drawn out in living characters.

Such was thy truth and such thy zeal,

Such deference to thy Father's will,

Such love and meekness so divine,

I would transcribe and make them mine.

And again the practice of the Presence leads to patience in suffering.

He with whom we walk is a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. "If we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together." Think you Simon of Cyrene complained of bearing the Master's cross while that Master, wearied by the same burden, walked beside him? Was it strange that Paul gloried in his tribulations when he was able to say, "I fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh?"

Once more, the practice of the Presence gives us fortitude in death.

Blessed is he who can say, "In the valley of the shadow I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me." In Wesley's last sickness he kept repeating, "We two are so joined, he can't go to heaven and leave me behind;" and at the very last he murmured, "Ay, this is the best of all; Immanuel! God with us!"

Oh blessed Secret of His Presence! Would that we all might get into it! And the way to get into it is to clasp hands with Jesus and never let go.

But can two walk together except they be agreed? Put self into the background, therefore, my friend, and let Christ have his way with you. Agree with him as to the terms of pardon, as to the rules of right living, as to the doctrines of the Christian faith; for otherwise you cannot Practice His Presence. These are the only terms on which a man can walk with God.

If we could spend but a single day in the Secret of His Presence, in uninterrupted communion with pecially serviceable in his religious work, and this was the foundation of his famous collection of Gospel hymns. Many different hymnals were issued under the Moody and Sankey auspices, all of them practically Mr. Sankey's compilation or done under his supervision. Millions of copies of the Moody and Sankey revival hymns have been sold since they first appeared. These hymns have had an unrivaled popularity, and still have a powerful hold on the hearts and affections of the Christian people of every land and all denominations. Their simple melodies and their inspiring choruses were just what was needed for the Gospel field, and the power of sacred song to move men's souls found in them most effective demonstration. Among the hymns written by Mr. Sankey, which have had the greatest popularity, are: "The Ninety and Nine," "The Cross of Jesus," "Jesus of Nazareth," "Onward and Upward," "There'll Be No Dark Valley," "Call Them Now," "A Little While," "Room for Thee," "A Shelter in the Time of Storm," "Tell It Out," "When the Mists Have Rolled Away," "How the Days Are Going By."

Of these Gospel hymns a critic recently wrote:

"The solace they have brought in sorrow, the inspiration in moments of despondency, the strength in the hour of weakness, proves that they are, after all, not to be judged by the strict canons of musical and literary art. In their own field, they are a law unto themselves. Many a man who can coolly dissect poetry and music of far higher technical excellence and can lay his finger unerringly upon the flaws, would hesitate to subject these hymns to critical analysis, for behind the words may lie a world of tender memory and profound emotion. The familiar cadence may recall the quiet Sundays of childhood and the menacing or pleading voice of the preacher, the aspirations of youth and its lofty resolves, and the solemn farewells of death. These images may come thronging back, more vivid than any evoked by the organ-notes of Milton."

One of his compositions was the memorial hymn Sankey wrote on the occasion of the death of Moody—"Out of the Shadow-Land," the first verse of which is as follows:

Out of the shadow-land, into the sunshine,
Cloudless, eternal, that fades not away,
Softly and tenderly Jesus hath called him,
Home, where the ransomed are gathering to-day.

Moody and Sankey together, in this country and abroad, faced some of the largest religious audiences of modern times. Their monster meetings during the famous English tour of 1873-75, and their tremendous gatherings in New York, Brooklyn and other American cities are still well remembered. Many who attended those meetings will be found to declare that in their experience they have never heard a preacher who drove home the Gospel truth with such force as D. L. Moody, nor have they ever heard a singer who reached the heart and conscience as Sankey did. Both were unique in their united field.

Mr. Sankey made several tours abroad. Writing from Jerusalem in 1898 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he told of his journeyings "over the road that Jesus traveled on his way to Calvary to die for the sins of the world." On the highest point of the citadel which was formerly the Tower of David, the evangelist sang verses from the Psalms. He visited Egypt, Athens, Rome, and many other points of interest during his Eastern tours and his fine baritone voice was heard wherever he went, singing the songs of salvation.

On returning from one of his tours, Mr. Sankey, at the request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, conducted a song service in the old Tombs Prison in New York. He began the memorable service singing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "The Ninety and Nine," and other hymns dear to the hearts of all men. He stood on the bridge between the second row of tiers. He could not see his audience, but as his sympathetic voice pealed out the lines he could hear half-subdued sighs along the rows of cells, and knew that many a sullen head was bowed upon a troubled breast. Even the hard-set faces of the keepers, steeled to all emotions, softened a little. Later, when the evangelist walked along the tiers, speaking a word of comfort through the bars to the occupant of each cell, he found many of the prisoners sitting on the edge of their beds, their heads bowed in their hands, and tears in their eyes.

One of Mr. Sankey's favorite projects was the establishment of a College of Sacred Song for the training of singing evangelists. Although this idea was never realized in the form in which he originated it, he did more, perhaps, than any other man in half a century to popularize Gospel song, not only by the many volumes of Gospel hymns he issued, but by the large number of compositions—his own work and that of others associated with him—which have appeared under his direction in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past fifteen years. Up to the time of his retirement, he was the musical editor of this journal, giving counsel and advice in the selection of the music that appeared in these pages during that time. These tunes, many of which found their first presentation in this journal, have been sung everywhere—in churches, meetings, tent services and home gatherings.

It was early in 1893 that Mr. Sankey first began to experience trouble with his eyesight. For several months he remained in enforced retirement, under treatment by expert physicians and oculists, who hoped to be able to save the sight of one eye at least, the other being already past saving. But the curtain of darkness which was gradually falling over the life of the great Gospel singer could not be lifted. His fine constitution and robust frame, which during his long association with Mr. Moody had enabled him to respond to every physical call, had broken down after the death of his Gospel partner. His physicians told him he should cease singing, as the optic nerves were dangerously affected; in fact, they gave him the alternative of silence or blindness. An operation was performed upon one eye, but the disease, which is known as glaucoma, had already made such rapid progress that the effort to save his sight was unavailing. This disease was due to an increase of the tension within the eyeball, and was undoubtedly caused by physical exhaustion from long-continued overwork. Within six months after the first development of the insidious disease, the Gospel singer was hopelessly blind.

Mr. Sankey's widow and two sons, Allan and Edward, survive him. In 1893 he presented a handsome new building to the Young Men's Christian Association at Newcastle, the town in which he spent his boyhood. The association, like many others in small communities, was poor and despaired of ever possessing a building such as associations in larger cities had found so helpful. The singer came to the rescue, bought the site, erected the building, fitted it with a well selected library and handed the whole over to the association as a memorial to his parents.

The India Famine

MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN writes from Bombay, India, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: "Nothing is known of the famine in India except that lakhs of rupees are being spent on it. But I saw an official statement that government had added the large district of Ranchee to the famine area; and I wrote at once to an old German missionary there (Mr. F. Hahn), to ask whether he were in need. He replied by telegraph: 'Help urgently needed; letter follows.' So putting the two things together it looks as if your $50 gift received through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had come providentially."

WINNING SOULS IN SAN SALVADOR

I RECENTLY made a short trip, visiting four of our stations in the interior of San Salvador. My first stop was at the city of Cojutepeque, where we have had only a few believers. It has seemed almost impossible to make any headway, as this city is one of the most fanatical in Salvador. It has been impossible to rent a place, because the priest has threatened the people with excommunication, so the few faithful hold their meetings in a ranch belonging to one of their members, just a little out of town. It was a great pleasure to find that the few had increased to over twenty-five men and women.

One of the believers who lived in the city gave me entertainment. Of course, we were seen coming into the house. Soon after I left our host was warned and told that his house would be taken away by foreclosure. (He is the owner.) The poor man was greatly troubled until he secured a loan, paid the mortgage and saved the house. We praise God that in spite of all the persecutions, there are scarcely any who turn back to the old sinful life.

We marvel when we see so many new faces at the different stations at every visit we make. At the other stations we found all our members, with a single exception, faithful. In Santa Maria Ostuma our believers have commenced to collect funds, and hope to put up their own chapel. The Sunday I was there, $350 was subscribed, and more promised. This was mostly from the working class. As soon as the rainy season is over they expect to begin building.

From Ostuma we went to San Pedro, and found a little company growing in grace and in numbers. A year ago the priest there had organized a mob to either drive me out of town or kill me, which they also attempted by stoning the house where we held our meetings; but, through the American minister, the attention of the government was called to the case, and the result was that the priest was removed, and the local authorities were ordered to give me protection. Since then we have perfect peace. One of the young women converts from San Pedro, who went to visit her relatives, won them by her testimony, and now her aunt and uncle worship the true God, and have delivered up their wooden images to the flames.

From San Pedro, in company with fifteen believers on horseback and others afoot, we went to a large farm and spent two days, holding two services a day. The word of the Lord is as a flame of fire, and many souls are coming into the light. Scarcely a week passes in which we do not hear of new places which colporteurs have visited, and where there are a few who desire the missionary to come and instruct them in the way of life.

A woman in one of our new stations told us she had bought a Testament, but the reading of it did not interest her, and she laid it aside. Later on of our colporteurs passed through, selling other religious books, and her attention was called to one book, and she bought it, and was deeply interested. The colporteur held several meetings which she attended. These reawakened her interest in her New Testament, and she is now a believer. This is another evidence of the good work done through the distribution of religious literature. Unfortunately we are limited in our supply for lack of funds. While we are the only foreign missionaries in this republic of over a million souls, we believe that through the distribution of religious literature many may be reached whom we cannot visit personally; so this is a great auxiliary to our work. Would that your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers might be led to help us launch a good stock of religious literature in this republic!

It is with pleasure that I acknowledge the remittance of $20, which you apportioned to me as my share from a gift of a charitably-disposed gentleman. San Salvador, C. A. ROBERT H. BENDER.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS AT NORTHFIELD

THE twenty-sixth session of the Northfield Conference for Christian Workers has attracted delegates from all over the world. The big Auditorium, which D. L. Moody built, was packed on Sunday when Dr. W. L. Watkinson, of London, addressed one of the greatest audiences Northfield has ever seen. The first of the meetings comes at 8 A.M., and they continue almost hourly until well into the evening.

Two unique meetings are the outdoor services at Camp Northfield and on Round Top, the first early in the morning. This service is held beside the Camp Council rock, where D. L. Moody used to address the campers in the days when he was here. The sunset service at Round Top is held beside his grave, and as the people sit on the hillside they can see the sun setting behind the hills of Vermont and New Hampshire.

August 17 marked the close of the twenty-sixth session of the Conference for Christian Workers. Delegates were present from all over the country, and nearly every city in New England was represented. Speakers also came from England and Scotland, while many of the missionaries came from the farthest fields of missionary activity. The session was almost unprecedented in point of numbers.

One day was devoted to missions, at which Rev. Joseph Clark, of the Congo, Dr. H. G. Underwood, of Korea, Rev. J. D. Taylor, of Africa, Dr. C. C. Creagan, secretary of the Congregational Board, and Rev. Charles E. Hurlburt, of Africa, told of the work in their res-spective fields. Dr. Underwood said that if the church did not increase its missionary activity, there would be no more Christians in the world two hundred years hence than now. In the evening, a big missionary rally was held, at which representatives of nearly every mission board and every mission field gave two-minute addresses. A number of natives from the various fields added interest to the occasion.

The closing meetings continued from sunrise until late in the evening. The principal speaker was Dr. W. L. Watkinson, of London, head of the Methodist Church in England, in which he has been a minister for over half a century. Special meetings were held for children, and outdoor services were addressed by leaders in various forms of Christian activity. The song service was led by Charles M. Alexander, with a choir of one hundred children and many soloists. Among the speakers whom he introduced have been Harry Munroe, Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago; M. E. Trotter, Rescue Mission in Grand Rapids, Mich., and W. S. Jacoby, formerly a policeman in Philadelphia.

Many delegates remain to attend the Post Conference. Extended courses will be given, lasting until the middle of September, after which Bible lectures will be given in the Northfield Schools, where over eight hundred pupils will meet. The speakers for the Post Conference are Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, of London; Rev. J. Stuart Holden, also from London, and the most prominent speaker this summer; and W. Gelesnoff, of New York, well known for his studies in the Old Testament.

Native Substitutes in Africa

Dear Christian Herald: Speaking both for our mission and for myself, we are very grateful to you for securing Miss Josselyn and Mr. and Mrs. Dows as patrons of this needy work. I have selected for them three worthy native teachers (men), two for Mr. and Mrs. Dows and one for Miss Josselyn. The names of the two former are Kachunga and Mukeudi, and the latter's name is Banza, a man whose ears were once cut off by cannibals, but who is now a trustworthy teacher and a good Christian. I shall be pleased to put these kind patrons into communication with their protégés at once, and I trust their mutual interest will be permanent. The patrons and protégés can thus correspond with each other.

Kachunga and Mukeudi are of our Lueleo station; Banza is from Ileanji, forty miles north of Lueleo.

Praying that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may exert its influence for these people of the Congo, and thanking you for your kind assistance, I remain yours in the Master's service, Lueleo, Congo. J. MCC. SIEG.

TOLSTOI'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

The Octogenarian Anniversary of the "Grand Old Man" of Russia, Which Many Countries Celebrate

IT IS a noteworthy event when the greatest living figure in the world's literary landscape attains his eightieth birthday, as Count Leo Nikolaevitch Tolstoi does on this September 9. Born in 1828, when the seething unrest of Western Europe was penetrating even into the remote obscurity of Russia, it is not strange that some of its fierceness and bewilderment should have passed into the soul of this characteristic child of the nineteenth century.

In his veins flowed the blood of two of the greatest of Russia's proud families. His mother was a princess of the Gortchakoff line, and his father's ancestors had been ambassadors and honored counselors of Russia's sovereigns for generations.

It was the misfortune of this gifted child to lose, at the age of two years, his beautiful and virtuous mother. From that time onward, he was cared for first by one relative and then another, until he went to the university. There he became so disgusted with the teaching given him and with what seemed to him the general unprofitableness of a student's life, that he insisted on giving up his course, and retiring to his country place, Yasnaya Polyana. This has been his home ever since—a spot famous as the scene for more than sixty years of those mental and moral struggles, and those socialistic experiments, portrayed in Tolstoi's books with unprecedented frankness, which have resulted in a character the like of which the world has never before seen.

Upon learning his intention to remain upon his estate, reduce it to order and elevate the seven hundred souls who dwell upon it, one of his aunts remonstrated with him. He was planning simply to waste himself. He should take up his residence in the city, like other young nobles. Diplomacy and society offered a proper field for the exercise of his talents. The misery of the peasants was inevitable. It seemed to be hopeless. Nothing could be done about it.

"I have never heard," concluded this excellent woman, "that a young man, well born and with a future, should inter himself in a village under the pretext of doing good. You have always wished to figure as an oddity; your oddity is only another name for your excessive self-love."

But no entreaties—no hidden sarcasms—no summons to a destiny which the world might call higher, could shake the resolution of this devoted youth. He had seen the woes of his peasants. His great heart had melted before them, and he had determined to dedicate his life to their alleviation.

For several years he was able to live up to his resolve. It was only natural that he should meet with discouragements. During those hard, long months of retirement of which the world knows little, he probed to its depths the bitter lot of the Russian peasantry. Impatient and ambitious, he had to learn the truth that civilization is a slow leaven. His serfs did not understand him. They distrusted and opposed him. They could not and would not learn what he longed to teach them, and he was willing, when his soldier-brother, Nikolai, came to Yasnaya Polyana in 1851, to return to the Caucasus with him and to enlist in the military service of his country.

For four years he fought in the army, first, of the Caucasus, then of the Crimea. The influence of this period upon his life and character cannot be overestimated. His horror of war, and his extreme views regarding non-resistance, were conceived then; and it was then also that the material was gathered for War and Peace, on the whole, Tolstoi's greatest work.

In 1862 occurred the event which probably saved this great reformer and mystic from entirely wreck-continuity of the generations, which comes with fatherhood, tended to sanify his mind.

"At this time," he says, "my religion was to provide for my wife and family."

For fifteen years he lived on quietly at Yasnaya Polyana, working among his peasants and writing occasionally. It was during this period that his two masterpieces, War and Peace and Anna Karenina, were produced.

Little by little, the yearning of his heart over the sins and sorrows of men overpowered his purely literary impulses. His mind was great, but his heart was greater. His work among his peasants and in the slums of Moscow, from which his village is but 100 miles distant, and where he has lived much during the winters; his army and diplomatic experience, during and just after the Crimean War; and now his family life, had armed him with weapons for philanthropic work such as few men have ever possessed. Behind all was a heart full of burning love for his kind; and book after book, pamphlet after pamphlet, dropped from his pen into the bubbling cauldron of Russian politics. Who can tell what Russia would now have been without him? Never was such democracy, not even in our own great seers and poets—never was such a literal and unlimited interpretation of the mission and the fraternity of Christianity.

Much of it is absurd and inconsistent. His singular doctrines regarding marriage do not agree together, and have led to the publication of certain books from his hand, which have been deplored by the judicious for the harm which they must inevitably do to the thoughtless and uninstructed. His criticisms of art and literature are sometimes almost laughable, in spite of their sincerity and their brilliant expression. But the loving, self-sacrificing spirit of the man overrides all the wrong-headedness and extremism, and beautifies everything he does.

His wonderful intellect may not be perfectly balanced, and his judgment may be often defective; but, like him who "awoke one night from a deep dream of peace," the angel will write him down among the foremost of those who have loved their fellow-men; and only the bigoted and narrow-minded will refuse on this anniversary to congratulate him, and even more the world, that he has lived to reach a venerable and honored old age in his storm-tossed land. ing his life through the fanatical views to which he was naturally prone. He married then Sophie Andreevna, the daughter of Dr. Behrs of Moscow, a woman of brilliant, scholarly attainments, high moral qualities, and, best of all, strong common sense—the quality in which Tolstoi himself is most deficient. From this time forward, he had a balance-wheel. Fifteen children were born to him, only seven of whom still survive.

In the flux and flow of Tolstoi's opinions and convictions during the whole early part of his manhood, his religions and his beliefs changed a dozen times. At sixteen, he says, he ceased to pray. During the horrors of the Crimean War, he ceased to believe in the existence of a good God. Only a fiend of infinite malignity could, he surmised, permit such frightful atrocities as then occurred. Thus, for a time, he was swayed hither and thither by doubts.

But as little ones gathered around his board, the clouds began to clear away. The great, simple facts of common life, and the glimpse of the imposing

The Dead Gospel Singer

THERE have been few men in the Gospel service, in a generation at least, whose passing away will awaken more tender and hallowed memories than that of Ira David Sankey. For nearly thirty years the prince of Gospel singers stood by the side of Dwight Lyman Moody, the greatest evangelist of his time. Attracted to each other by their mutual earnestness in evangelistic work, it was a partnership that lasted through life. Moody's searching appeals, supplemented by Sankey's noble and effective creations of sacred song, rendered with a power and pathos that were unsurpassed, swayed great multitudes not only in America, but across the sea.

Sankey's fine voice once heard in such hymns as "The Ninety and Nine," "No Dark Valley," and others of his own composing, could never be forgotten. His compositions were natural and spontaneous, and he had the rare gift of knowing the melodic themes that would reach the heart. Thousands upon thousands have been swept into the Kingdom by his singing, for, as Moody declared, "he felt every word he sang, and he sang and believed every word he felt."

When, after the death of his long-time associate, the burden of years and the shadow of approaching blindness fell upon the singer, the splendid voice was heard in public no more. But in the quiet of his own home there were times when the blind singer still reveled in those sweet and heart-moving strains that had swayed multitudes. He was no theologian, but he had a very clear spiritual illumination, and a call to a mission which to many was the summons to a new and better life. He "sang the Gospel" as no other singer has ever done, and if his songs were simple and lowly, for that very reason they went more quickly and surely to their mark. His songs will endure, and will continue to bring back the wanderers to the Shepherd's fold, while more pretentious compositions are forgotten.

All honor to the memory of Ira David Sankey, the sweet singer, whose work on earth was so well and nobly accomplished.

A Burning Question

A CORRESPONDENT of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD writes from Cardinal, Va., a cordial approval of the recent advice in these columns upon "The Test of Amusements." She says:

Your answer is wise and timely; but what shall our young people do that will satisfy the craving for social life and the need of change, and yet do nothing which can dishonor Christ, influence others in wrong directions or hinder growth? They want life, life, life! It seems to me that the church is far too satisfied with restrictive directions; and while the world furnishes attractions galore, the church does not attract the young men of to-day because it offers little that is positive. I believe that young people can learn to find truest recreation and pleasure in forms of activity that are not only healthful but positively upbuilding to personal character.

No one appreciates more fully than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the necessity of providing lively and absorbing amusements for our young people, especially for our young men. In the summer, they are amply provided for. Tennis, golf and baseball are all clean and manly sports. Pagan and Christian can enjoy them together and thus good influences may be brought strongly to bear, by those who are looking out for chances to do good. It is undeniably an advantage when the world's people and Christ's people can meet on a common ground of innocent mirth and merry-making. It is when the separation occurs that the hard strain comes.

On this account, many excellent people may esteem our attitude on card-playing unduly severe. They would allow it, so long as no money or other stake is made upon the game. But the associations and tendencies still remain; it is still true that cards are the tools of the gambler. All Christians admit those facts to be objectionable and dangerous to morality. In the same way dancing, and especially the so-called "round" dances, with the usual accompaniment of late hours, indigestible suppers, and, too often, doubtful company, can hardly be commended to the patronage of Christian people.

But each must work out his own salvation in this as in other personal matters. Let your recreations be as clean as your business. Apply to them the simple test of conscientious approval or disapproval.

If they are clean and honorable, and such as will leave no moral stain, there is no reason why you should not enjoy them to your heart's content.

Secretary Cortelyou's Advice

THERE are many fraudulent financial schemes thrust before the public nowadays which, at the outset, would seem almost to defy detection. Mr. Cortelyou, Secretary of the Treasury, has rendered a public service in pointing out what he styles the "common characteristics" of those swindles. One of the earmarks of fraud, he says, is the promise of excessive profits or dividends; another is the actual payment of excessive dividends at the start. These two features invariably accompany all such schemes. He cites several recent gigantic swindles in which people were asked to send in their money to form a great speculative fund or trust, which would "swing the market" and make the big capitalists yield up some of their wealth. Of course, nothing of the kind happened; but the credulous contributors or investors were mercilessly fleeced by the tens of thousands. The lesson of Secretary Cortelyou's timely warning is to distrust any scheme that promises to open up an easy road to wealth. At this time, when the press is flooded with swindles of every degree, it is well to remember the Secretary's warning.

The Standard of Evangelism

PROPOS of the controversy concerning the methods of evangelists, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received, among a large number of letters, the following from an Iowa pastor, which we strongly commend to the careful consideration of evangelists and to our readers generally. Speaking of a certain type of evangelist, the writer says:

His methods are not above criticism. He invites penitents forward for prayers, and they all at that time receive the O. K. of the evangelist, and whether they are accepted of the Lord or not, they will do to count, to add to the reputation of the evangelist. To me this is positively abominable! When any one announces a desire to be saved, it becomes a question to be settled by that soul and the Almighty, without any outside interference from any one. Some will find peace immediately by believing, and others will not. The sequel is to be worked out by the seeker and his God, if it be one moment or one year.

I am satisfied that this immature method results in loading up the churches with hosts of unsaved people, who are a positive detriment rather than a blessing. At one town where I am now preaching an evangelist held a meeting some years ago. He reported 150 converts. To-day there is but one standing faithful. I imagine about the same percentage will hold good in all his work. It may be said that the one soul is worth all the effort. This may be true in a sense, but it betrays false reasoning. If one soul is as good as another, what is to save such a system if it be shown that ten are lost through self-deception to every one saved? Tested by moral mathematics, the system ends in inglorious failure.

This plain speech on a live question from a faithful minister of over forty years' standing, is not to be lightly set aside. It is precisely what thousands of other ministers and the great majority of good church members feel and what they would say, in equally plain talk, if they had the courage. Happily, most evangelists are governed by sensible methods, and, while using forcible and direct language, they do not descend to the cheap sensational methods our correspondent so accurately describes. Many evangelists write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we know that their work, as a whole, is careful, thorough and reverent throughout; it is deep and lasting and not to be classed with the superficial and sensational work which sometimes passes for evangelism.

A Play of the Pit

SOME years ago, when it was proposed to present the Passion Play in New York, public indignation rose to such a pitch over the threatened sacrilege that it was quickly abandoned. Now we have a singular reversal of the situation. The metropolitan theatres have put his Satanic majesty on the boards in a play in which he is the principal character—we need not say the hero—and not a single remonstrance has been raised against it up to the present moment. It was probably to be expected that the ruling influence so long behind the scenes in many theatres should come to the front at last, as the master-spirit in a play which affords ample scope for the delineation of the traditional diabolic nature. There may be amusement for a certain kind of theatre-going folks in a drama which has for its theme the wrecking of two souls, and the spinning of a web of lies, deception and immorality; but it is surely the amusement of the pit itself.

Disregarding the shallow claim that the piece is sort of "morality play," the disgusted critics have stamped the thing as a dismal failure. Following closely on the heels of the outrageous "Salome," this vicious drama, with its sinister title, has furnished the strongest argument against the theatre that has been heard in many a day.

The Exercise of Faith

A READER of this journal, H. A. B., of Sanborn, N. Y., sends this inquiry, which is one that frequently suggests itself to other minds:

Faith is a most important topic and also a most perplexing one. We find in the Bible many statements that seem conflicting. Is faith voluntary or involuntary? If faith is controlled by the will, then the culpability of the sceptic is obvious. If it is involuntary, how can the guilt of the sceptic be proved? Does not faith depend altogether upon our judgment as to the truth of the subject at issue?

We trust that the following exposition of the subject by Pastor Sheldon, one of our regular staff contributors (and the author of many books treating of faith and the Christian life), may prove enlightening and helpful to our inquirer and others:

"The exercise of faith, as taught by the Bible and learned from human experience, is a very simple and, to my mind, a very voluntary thing. The farmer who has faith in God prays, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' and then goes out and prepares his ground for the seed. He sows it, reaps it, threshes it and hauls it to the mill. It is ground and goes through several processes before it is a loaf of bread on his table. God furnishes the seed, which man cannot make; he furnishes sun, rain, heat, cold, and all the power of growth. The farmer exercises his faith in God when he prays for daily bread, and shows his faith by his works.

"It is the same with the act of faith in salvation. We believe in the power of God to forgive sins and do what we cannot do, and if our faith is good for anything, we at once do the things ourselves which make for character and Christlikeness. All these acts are voluntary on our part, like the farmer's acts in sowing the seed and tending the harvest. Faith is simply man trusting God to do what God can do while man does what God does not need to do for him. Salvation will not come to a man who sits down and does nothing for his own soul, any more than a loaf of bread will miraculously get on the farmer's table if he prays for daily bread, and does not work to get it. Faith and works are inseparable in nature, in science, in business, and in religion.

Honored Syrian Missionaries

IT WOULD be difficult to find a more intelligent or comely group of faces than those presented in the picture upon this page. The faces represent the workers in the Syria Mission to-day. These characters express so much of personal worth, of storic missionary value, of heroic devotion to the salvation of the world, that they will delight and inspire the great family of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose hearts are in such deep sympathy with the woes and the wants and the salvation of the world. This picture group was sent in a letter to the editor of this paper from Beirut, by Rev. F. Hoskins of the Syria Mission. From the report of the Mission for 1907 we take these facts:

"In 1857 there were, all told, only 75 native church members. In 1907 there were 34 organized churches with 2,819 members, of whom 151 were admitted during the year. None of the presbyteries existed twenty years ago, but now they are the real centre of evangelical church life. Fifty years ago there were nine stations, with 16 preaching places, within the bounds of the Syria Mission. In 1897 there were 94 preaching places. The 30 schools of 1857, with 1,030 pupils, have grown in 1907 into 105 schools with 5,115 pupils, and these make no account of the college with its 850 students, that grew out of the Mission work. Two hundred and forty native and foreign workers, gathering up the experiences and teachings of two-thirds of a century, are praying and working still in faith of the coming Kingdom. These represent the gifts of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. No imposing churches have been built, no jeweled shrines reared at supposed holy places, but into thousands of darkened hearts the light has shined and peace and good will increased among all the conditions of men."

These venerable missionaries, with a half century of service such as is rarely seen, have had a large share in ringing about the success of the work and in hastening the coming of the Kingdom of our Lord. These consecrated toilers have not only blessed the field in which they wrought, but their glorious services are a divine inspiration to the members of the church in our home land. What these splendid workers have done is being accomplished in every land and every clime, and the results of the last fifty years, in all the fields, have been almost miraculous; and the story of past success is only the prophecy of larger generosity at home and continuous self-sacrificing services in the foreign field.

Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white ready to harvest. (John 4: 35.)

Caterpillars by the Quart

The caterpillars have made such havoc with the elm and maple trees of Newark, N. J., that the Shade Tree Commission has arranged to pay ten cents a quart for all these insects that the children will catch. The school children of the city have organized a brigade for an onslaught on this enemy of vegetation. The employees of the Commission are stationed at designated points at various parts, to receive the consignments of worms that are brought in. They measure the various consignments and issue receipts, in return for which the City Clerk's office gives the required amount of cash. It is expected that at least a dozen car loads of these pests will be destroyed by this process.

Everything that lives has an enemy ready to destroy it. Every plant and animal and life and soul has such an enemy to pester and, if possible, to kill it, and the great fight of life with the farmer, the physician, the moralist and the pastor, is to defeat and destroy this foe. The Bible was written and the atonement was provided upon the hypothesis that the soul has fatal diseases to resist and mortal enemies to overcome.

And your spoil shall be gathered like the gathering of the caterpillar. (Isa. 33: 4.)

The Great Pigeon Race

One of the most exciting contests of the year was the great pigeon race from France to England, in the annual Pigeon Derby which took place recently. Seven thousand five hundred and thirteen birds flew back home—a distance of 450 miles. The birds were taken from Manchester to Southampton and again from St. Malo to Nantes, by special train. There were 687 baskets and they occupied fourteen railway vans. On the arrival of these baskets at the station at Nantes, they were placed in the open space by the side of the railway and the lids were opened by the railway officials. Immediately, the thousands of pigeons arose and started on their swift journey home. The winning bird belonged to Mr. T. Dobson, of Milnthorpe, and made the journey at the rate of almost fifty miles an hour.

How strangely have some animals been endowed with the home instinct! Horses have been taken over new roads for fifty or a hundred miles, and making an escape from the stable, have turned their heads toward home. Dogs have been blindfolded and carried in cars long distances, and when released have made their way back home. What a picture it was to see more than 7,000 pigeons start from France and fly straight back home to England! This instinct of the carrier pigeon is a hint of that higher and healthier love in man for home, which is the symbol of everything that is true and beautiful and good in the individual life and public character. It is this home tie that binds society with the smallest unit and the largest aggregations. It is the measure of a nation's thrift and happiness. A true home is the symbol of heaven; and Christ, when he referred to heaven, described it as mansions in his Father's house. To the Christian, death is often described as the release of the soul from the fetters and imprisonments of earth, and its flight like a dove to its home.

O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest. (Psa. 55: 6.)

The Deadly Automobile

The automobile continues its fearful harvest of death. In itself it is a dangerous thing. Accidents are certain to occur though the machine be driven with the utmost prudence. But under the reckless driving in our thickly settled communities the accidents are almost of hourly occurrence, and of fatal consequences. Much of the slaughter is criminal. Incompetent men take their own lives and those of their families in their hands in the mistakes they make, and drinking and dissipation pile up the record of suicide and murder. The ruddy faced merchant, the jolly millionaire, the profligate sons and daughters of luxury are among the victims. It would be bad enough if the occupants of the motor cars were the only victims. They are not. Innocent little children and old people, men and women about their daily tasks, are hurled into eternity by these reckless speeders. There must be a better protection against this wholesale massacre.

There is but a step between me and death. (I. Sam. 20: 3.)

The President's Advice to Boys

In a letter President Roosevelt gives this excellent advice to the boys of the country:

"To the boys I wish to say a special word. I emphatically believe in manliness, in courage, in physical address, but I believe quite as much in good comradeship and in a spirit of fair play. I hope that whenever you enter a contest you will do all that is in you to win, and yet that you will remember that it is far better to fail than to win by any unfairness, by any underhand trickery.

"Keep in mind that it is only by persistent effort in the face of discouragement that any of us ever do anything that is really worth while doing. The fellow who gives up when he is once beaten is made of mighty poor stuff, and if he thus gives up as soon as he is beaten in a sport he does not stand much chance of success in the serious conflicts of after life. The true spirit which wins victories in after life is the spirit which fights hard to succeed, but which takes defeat with good nature and with the resolute determination to try again. It is a good beginning for this serious work of after life if on the play-grounds you learn how to co-operate with your fellows, and to do your best to win, while at the same time treating your opponents with fairness and courtesy." In these days of fierce competition and contests in the mental and moral realm it will be well for the boys and young men to heed this exhortation to honesty, fair dealing, and persistent effort.

Let us play the men for our people. (II. Sam. 10: 12.)

Funeral Service for Birds

Two thousand birds were killed by a terrific rain-storm in the groves near West Sixtieth and Ada Streets in Chicago one day in August. The children of the neighborhood had a burial service. The 2,000 feathered bodies were laid to rest in a wide grave, while the children stood with bowed heads sobbing as they strewed simple flowers over them. The girls led in the formal exercises.

It was a solemn and beautiful sight, and brought tears to the eyes of grown people who witnessed it. Children with such tender sensibilities toward the birds will make kind friends, true lovers and good citizens. A part of the burial service indicated deep sorrow for the destruction of the songsters, but faith in the superintendency of God, as expressed in this little prayer that was used:

We are very sorry, O God, that all the poor birds had to die. For we would like to have them stay around in the trees. But we need rain, and you know what is best.

A world of human sentiment and healthful theology was crowded into that little prayer.

Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. (Matt. 10: 29.)

STARTING A SCHOOL SYSTEM IN SIAM

THE territory for which Nan station in Siam is responsible is one of magnificent distances. The journey from Nan to the northern boundary takes eight days, to the western three days, to the southern about five days, and to the eastern no one knows; no one has ever gotten there yet. The roads are single foot-paths, often just wide enough for a man to carry his baskets hung on a stick across his shoulder. Carts are practically unknown and outside of the city horses are scarcer than elephants. Made roads are undreamed of. There are only the bare foot-paths of countless ages, often curving around where a tree had fallen and rotted away in some former generation, or following up the rocky bed of some crooked mountain stream.

The people are widely scattered over the province, often long distances from their neighbors, but in little hamlets which are grouped around the rice plain from which they get their living. These groups contain from one or two hundred inhabitants up to ten or more thousand, according to the size and fertility of the plain. Many of these groups of villages are almost inaccessible from outside a large part of the year, but it is easy for the people to come together.

The hot season begins about the middle of March and in June turns into the rainy season, with its swollen rivers. This lasts until November. During these seasons it is difficult, and much of the time impossible, to do touring work in the distant parts of the province.

There are no government schools in this province except one or two little ones in the city. A few of the boys of the country learn to read and write a little Laos by entering the Buddhist priesthood for a number of years. Of course, even that resort is cut off from the Christian boys and there is no help at all for the girls. The prospect for the church is truly pitiable if its future laity is to grow up in even denser ignorance than their heathen neighbors. The only way to avoid the catastrophe is for the church to establish schools in the Christian neighborhoods.

That is what we plan to do. We wish to select the more promising boys from the Christian families and bring them here to Nan and train them physically, mentally, and especially spiritually, and then send them out into these groups as teachers of the children and to preach and live the Christian reli-few weeks' conference and Bible study and for re-energizing. As these schools grow, the more promising material will be selected and brought to head school in the city and trained take up the same work of teaching. This way the system will be self-propagating and the schools of the country will be Christian and in the control of the church. At the same time it will be a wedge for opening up the whole land to the influence of the Gospel its most vital and receptive spot—the children, and through the children to the home. And not only so, but it will also be a means of helping maintain the work of native evangelists, for the heathen neighbors will avail themselves of the opportunity of sending their children to school and many of them will be able to pay for it, thus helping to support the evangelist who teaches the Christian children and preaches the Gospel.

A small beginning has already been made in the head school in Nan. About twelve or fifteen boys are being instructed and trained for this special work of teaching and Christian leadership. There is also a number of other children, among whom are the sons of the highest Siamese officials and native princes, who are constantly in contact with and under instruction in Christianity. Some of these pay a small tuition fee, which aids in the support of the school. Most of the boys from the country are poor and have to be fed and clothed, but they help when they can by working in the mission and Christian homes, by gardening, teaching in the school, etc. However, it still lacks quite a little of self-support. The fifty dollars ($50) kindly sent us by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently, was most gratefully received and will be used in the furtherance of this good work.

A Native School at Nan, Siam

But who are to teach these schools? Many of these groups of villages, both heathen and Christian, are asking us to establish schools for their children, for they want them educated, and they have no faith in the help from the government. But how are we to supply this demand for teachers? These teachers will first have to be taught.

gion and to conduct the regular Sabbath services. The missionary who has charge of that particular district will keep close watch upon these teachers and will visit them as often as possible to encourage them in the work and to baptize any that may be ready. At least once a year it is hoped to gather all these teachers together for a

JAVANESE CONVERTS BUILD A CHURCH

FIFTEEN miles from Batavia is the village of Pondok Gedé. Here the brown Malay lives his quiet life, among his rice fields and banana and cocoanut groves. Were you to visit him at holiday time, you would find an unusual amount of excitement. Last Christmas some two hundred men, women and children who had not found in Mohammedanism the joy and peace their hearts craved, and who had become Jesus' disciples, met to dedicate their new bamboo church. As the time of service drew near the "runner" might be seen going in and out among the rice fields to the various patches of woodland each of which shelters its own little group of basket-houses. Soon little companies began to find their way to the church. As the people arrive, tabels (greetings) are said, and work begins.

First of all the Christmas tree has to be made. Who ever heard of making a Christmas tree? But wait. They bring a great soft stump which, deprived of its leaves, you may not at first recognize as a banana tree trunk. This stump is securely fixed into the centre of the earthen floor of the little bamboo church. Then comes a man with an armful of bamboo sticks, large and small. These stiff, hand-made branches are pushed straight through the banana stalk at right angles, and with the help of a few fir-like vines, transform the stump into the semblance of a stately pine. Now the eyes begin to sparkle and dance as the missionary opens his Santa's sack from which pour the love-tokens from far across the sea. This was the first service in the new chapel, largely the work of their own hands.

Service over, the people find their way back to their homes, each happy with some token of love.

There is in this village a very great need. To these simple country folks such a thing as a clock or time piece of any kind is almost unknown. Many a Sabbath morning, the spiritual food which the pastor has labored hard to prepare for his flock is lost because of tardiness of the people in coming to church. What we need is a bell whose voice will not only call to worship those who are followers of Christ but will also serve as a constant reminder to the hundreds of natives in the surrounding village that the religion of our Lord has come among them to stay. It may be that amid the many good deeds of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers some may find it in their hearts to help us to get a bell to summon our people to worship the true God here in this far away heathen land.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—MRS. ELIZABETH JANSSEN, missionary at Cebu, P. I., writes: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mission boat continues to render excellent service and brings great relief to the missionaries and native evangelists."

—MISSIONARY E. H. RICHARDS writes from Inhambane, Africa, that there are now in the group of mission stations under his care 400 native children friendless and unprovided for, whom the faithful workers are training for lives of usefulness.

—MRS. E. W. WHITTEMORE recently held twenty-seven Gospel meetings in St. Paul, Minneapolis, Winona, Chicago, Mitchell, Orleans, Burlington, Peoria, and Hannibal. This was all done in seventeen days. She is now completing her summer campaign in California.

—THE CHURCH FEDERATION of Los Angeles, Calif., serves as a clearing house for churches of all denominations. Members of any church moving to that city can send name, address, and denomination, and they will be put in communication with a pastor of their own denomination.

—EVANGELIST E. O. GUERRANT writes from Wilmore, Ky.: "God is blessing the 'Soul Winners' work among the Highlanders. We opened a new College (The Highland College) in the Cumberland last month. The Governor of Kentucky made an address. We will open our new Orphans' Home this month for the mountain children."

—PURITY FARM, Cherokee, Okla., is not a reform school. Students work at farm work and cement blocks ninety hours a month to make expenses and then attend Stella Academy. Several buildings for boys and girls are planned at a cost of about $20,000. The school is a Quaker school, and Rev. C. A. Mitchell, the superintendent, is a Methodist minister.

—LUCY PAGE GASTON, Superintendent of the National Anti-Cigarette League, Chicago, writes: "Just as fast as our funds permit, we shall urge anti-cigarette laws in the State Legislatures. Already Indiana, Tennessee, Wisconsin, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Washington, and Arkansas have placed a ban upon this, the greatest menace to the boy."

—THE COMMITTEE in charge of the meetings at Lemon Hill, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, this week, hold a series of conference and platform meetings. Tuesday afternoon and night will be Sunday School Day; Wednesday, Young People's Day; Thursday, work among men and boys; Friday, Visitors' Day; Saturday, festival of sacred song; Sabbath, September 6, Harvest Home.

—A MOVEMENT is on foot in Victoria, Australia, looking to the union of the Anglican and Presbyterian churches in that country. The British Weekly, referring to it, says: "We may be quite sure no essential principle will be sacrificed by the Presbyterians of Victoria, and only those who know the circumstances of the colony can fully understand the pressure which is compelling Christian people towards union."

—REV. HERBERT C. WITHEY of the Methodist Episcopal Mission in Angola, Africa, who after twenty years of service in Africa, beginning as a boy twelve years of age, has been on furlough in this country for the past two years, sails from New York this month returning to his field of labor in Africa. Mr. Withey has completed for the British and Foreign Bible Society the translation of the New Testament into Kimbundu.

—PRINCIPAL ARCHIBALD, of Taylor University, writes: "The Vice-Presidential nominee of the Prohibition party, Rev. A. S. Watkins, received his Ph.D. at Taylor University. The newly elected president of the university, Rev. Monroe Vayhinger, is on the Prohibition State ticket for State Superintendent of Public Instruction. Mrs. Vayhinger, his wife, is State Superintendent of the W. C. T. U. It looks as if our school might continue to maintain her reputation for Prohibition."

The Old Hymns

THERE'S lots o' music in 'em, the hymns of long ago;
n' when some gray-haired brother sings the ones I used to know, sorter want to take a hand—I think o' days gone by,
On Jordan's stormy banks I stand, and cast a wistful eye."
here's lots o' music in 'em—those dear sweet hymns of old,
With visions bright of lands of light and shining streets of gold;
and I hear 'em ringing—singing, where memory dreaming stands,
From Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands."
hey seem to sing forever of holier, sweeter days,
When the lilies of the love of God bloomed white in all the ways;
and I want to hear their music from the old-time meetin' rise, ill "I can read my title clear to mansions in the skies."
Ve hardly needed singin' books in them old days; we knew he words, the tunes of every one the dear old hymn-book through!
Ve had no blaring trumpets then, no organs built for show,
Ve only sang to praise the Lord,
"from whom all blessings flow." n' so I love the dear old hymns, and when my time shall come—efore the light has left me and my singing lips are dumb—
f I can only hear 'em then, I'll pass, without a sigh,
To Canaan's fair and happy land, where my possessions lie!"

Making Young Patriots

CONSIDERABLE interest has been awakened by the recent publication in these pages of an article describing the School City project of Prof. Wilton L. Gill, who is the originator of the School City or Youths' Republic. Several years ago, we described in these columns his remarkable work in Cuba, as supervisor of moral and civic training among the boys and girls of that island. Dr. Enrique José Varona, Secretary of Public Instruction in General Wood's Cabinet (who gave Mr. Gill the sobriquet of "Apostle to the Cubans"), in his official report called the School City "the solution of the greatest of all pedagogical problems, that of moral education through the schools." Dr. Lincoln de Zayas, present Secretary of Public Instruction, wrote: "Mr. Gill's system will convert every school into a miniature republic and every pupil into a peaceful, law-abiding, righteous citizen."
The School City or Youths' Republic does not end with the teaching of good receipts. Day by day, hour by hour, it fills the child's life so full of happy thoughts and joyful actions that there is no room left for the ordinary bickerings, injustice and other ugly things that blight childhood and dwarf the spirit of adult years. The children are taught to co-operate for the happiness and welfare of the whole child and adult community. They become, in fact, little citizens, filled with the civic spirit of good will, and are led into those practices which are necessary for the defense and development of the great and glorious institutions of our country.
The School City does not consume time, but rather saves time. The pupils cease to look upon their teachers as masters and drivers, and regard them as friends and leaders.
The plan of the School City is wonderfully elastic, and admits of every phase of government, from those of the village and township to those of the State and national government and an endless variety of forms and combinations. However, after years of experience in numerous schools, Mr. Gill's preference is to organize the pupils of each separate room into a municipality, the little citizens electing their mayor, president of city council, judge, sheriff, treasurer, clerks and such other officers as may seem desirable in that particular school room. "MY BOY"

Written for The Christian Herald by W. Livingston Larned
Drawing by Richard Culter

I.
I KNOW that the lad has been erring,
I know he is wayward and all;
But still with his faults I am bearing,
He's mine—and I'll hearken his call.
You say: "Jim should go with the others
Who darken their steps and our joy."
But Jim has his sisters and brothers,
And Jim is still mine—he's my boy.

II.
Way out on the paths that sin carries
Jim wanders—he knows what it means
To suffer. Just wait till he marries,
Jim's still in his youth and his teens.
I've been like the black sheep, and flurried
My father, he's known the annoy
Of "sowing wild oats," but he worried
If any one slighted his "boy."

III.
It's when life is meanest and narrow,
I want them to come to their "dad,"
You might say the sympathies harrow,
When boys slip the reins and are bad;
But, bless you, the sunshine we scatter
As clouds all our pleasures alloy,
Means more than inquiring "the matter,"
Throw open your arms to the "boy."

IV.
Yes, Jim has been up to his fooling,
His friends turn aside with a sneer;
I'm one that won't turn—it's my ruling;
He's mine—and God bless him, you hear!
Let Jim feel there's one in the struggle,
His champion—his to employ;
Dad's son, when in arms he would snuggle
And now, more than ever, "dad's boy."

health, games, public works, police, etc., may be provided for by the city council and appointed by the mayor. All who are not elected or appointed to office are members of the city council. The School Cities in one building may be joined in a School State, and the children of all the classes elect the governor and other State officers. In a very large school, there may be two or more School States.

The School City movement has spread to other lands and action has been taken to unite all who are taking part in it into a Children's International State. Mr. Gill will welcome intelligent co-operation by educators and others who are interested and will answer all inquiries made with that purpose in view. His address is No. 5 East Twelfth Street, New York City.

The Presence of God

him, what a day that would be! To rise in the morning and feel his hand-clasp; to be sensible of His Presence with us in the office or the workshop, or at our household cares; to come to the day's close without a break of that hand-clasp, and then to sleep beneath the shadow of his wings: what a day that would be!

And if a lifetime were spent thus in the Secret of His Presence, what a life that would be! The biography of Enoch is written in this brief monograph, "He walked with God; and he was not, for God took him." Up the steep paths of toil and suffering he climbed in that sweet fellowship, until he crossed the summit of the hills. His friends wept, saying, "Enoch is dead." But Enoch was not dead. He had simply gone on and passed more fully into the Great Secret.

Forever with the Lord!
Amen, so let it be:
Life from the dead is in that word:
'Tis immortality.

So shall we dwell with the Lord forever. We shall be in that conscious, abiding and delectable Presence, of which it is written, "In His Presence is fulness of joy; at his right hand are pleasures forevermore." This is the blessedness of heaven; to practise, forever and forever, the Presence of God.

The Unseen Guest

Written after a visit to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn

ONE Guest was there that summer day,
Whose face and form we could not see,
He listened when we tried to pray,
And smiled with calm benignity,
To hear the songs the children sang,
Until the woodland echoes rang.

Yes, he was there! He sat beside
Those boys and maidens, and he knew
All who for his dear sake had tried
To make them happy, good and true;
His silent lips spake not a word,
And yet, how all our hearts were stirred!

For deep within the soul he spake
His message of approving love,
To all who for his own dear sake,
Sought to make earth like heaven above.
And those who heard his voice were blest—
The voice that hushed the raging sea
Said, "Ye have done it unto me."

And every day in every room,
And out beneath the open sky
Will Jesus come. And when the gloom
Of night shuts out all sight,
By every bedside will he wait
With hands of blessing open wide;
Nor shall one life be desolate,
But each be fully satisfied!

A Stranger from the Arctic

THE mission yacht Messenger continues her work among the fleet of vessels that congregate in New York harbor. She gives to the incoming ships a supply of good literature. The workers on the mission yacht are alert to help the sailors with such necessities as may prove a temporal or spiritual blessing. Owing to the lack of employment this summer there are thousands destitute along the water front. Many ships are out of commission and laid up without crews. Hence many seamen come to the mission yacht seeking for food. None are turned hungry away, although no funds are provided for this great need. A few days ago a dusky sailor was found trying to get some nourishment from a bone that some dog had been eating on the dock. The man proved to be an Esquimaux, who had been brought here on a whaling ship and cast ashore to shift for himself. He had gone on the ship while she was in the Arctic sea and they forced him to remain and work in place of a sailor who was lost. He speaks no English. It is a difficult thing to decide what shall be done with the lone Esquimaux, so far from his kinsmen. The mission boat workers think he might be taught the Gospel, and eventually sent back on some ship bound to the far North to carry the tidings of the cross to the wandering tribes of the Arctic Sea.

The good results of circulating literature among seamen is self-evident from the fact that many sailormen now ask for religious papers, and speak of the change in their lives through the knowledge they gained from the printed page. Any reader interested in this work may address Captain G. E. Benn, P. O. Box 157, Brooklyn, N. Y.

A Heathen and His Idols

MR. F. S. ARNOT, the famous missionary-explorer, who lately returned from his fifth journey through the heart of the Dark Continent, tells of a notable conversion in the Zambezi country. A powerful chief called his people together to witness the destruction of his idols. As he flung them one by one into the river, the people who lined the banks expected to see him drop dead. As the fetishes sank beneath the waters he cried out, "If you are gods, why don't you float?" It was an interesting fact that this scene took place at one of the fords of the Zambezi many years ago crossed by Livingstone in his exploration for the source of the river.

THE CROWN OF TRUE SUCCESS*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

DAVID inquired of the Lord," as Moses and Joshua and Samuel had done, and it seemed to be a more direct approach to God than through prayer. Possibly David may have inquired of God through Abiathar, the high priest.

"Unto Hebron." That was God's reply when David inquired where he should go. Just returning from an exile of a year and a half, he had no abiding place, and it was important where the new king should choose his home. Hebron was a strategic point because: 1. Many of the six hundred men who had joined themselves to David had their homes in that region. 2. The Philistines would be his nearest neighbors, and David's friendly relations with them would make him safe from attack by them. 3. Hebron was a place of great interest to the Israelites because it was there Abraham first pitched his tent when he entered the Promised Land, and his sepulchre was there, and is there to-day. "And there they anointed David king over the house of Judah." He had been anointed privately by Samuel probably about ten years before. This was the public anointing and inauguration, not as king over the whole nation, but only over the tribe of Judah.

"And David sent messages unto the men of Jabesh-Gilead," either to placate them, or to reassure them, for the message was one of commendation because they had gone into the Philistines' country, and taken down the bodies of King Saul and his sons from the walls of the city where they had been hung in derision, and burned their flesh and buried their bones. David went afterwards and brought the bones of Saul and his sons and buried them in the ancestral sepulchre in the country of Benjamin (II. Sam. 21: 12-15).

David Anointed King of Israel

"Then came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron . . . and they anointed David king over Israel." This was the second public anointing, and occurred seven and one half years after David had been inaugurated king of Judah. His capital was then removed from Hebron to Jerusalem. The time was ripe for David to be crowned king over all Israel, because the only remaining son of Saul, Ishbosheth, had just died. He had vainly tried, backed by Abner, the captain of Saul's host, to establish himself as the successor of his father, and had actually ruled over the northern part of the kingdom for two years. But Abner was dead as well as Ishbosheth, and the people came in loyalty to David, saying: "Behold, we are thy bone and flesh." They represented 339,600 warriors, and they recalled the days when David had gone before them into battle, as a good reason for serving him now. As king over Judah David reigned seven and one-half years; as king over all Israel and Judah he reigned thirty-three years.

It has been said that when David was first anointed to be king, by Samuel in Bethlehem, he was chosen not so much for his excellence of character as for the possibilities of excellence to be developed by the grace of God through his obedience. And so David's crown of success was to be won. He was an obedient son, a faithful shepherd, a courageous warrior, because he relied upon God's strength. His life was a schooling for true kingship. So life is schooling us.

In addressing a company of young students President Roosevelt said: "I do not want to see Christianity professed only by weaklings. I want to see it a moving spirit among men of strength. I do not expect you to lose one particle of your strength or courage by being decent. I desire to see in this country the decent men strong, and the strong men decent, and until we get this combination in pretty good shape we are not going to be by any means as successful as we should be. If you are to be effective as good Christians, you have got to possess strength and courage, or your example Adirondacks and Catskills, which are to this day among the loveliest creations of American genius.

It has been said, "The fact that the finely veined marble of Pentelicus was close at hand was a happy circumstance for the Athenian sculptor, but does not explain the Parthenon. The faultless moulding and grouping of the figures that crowded its frieze came from a mind sensitive to the highest beauty, and a hand sure and firm in its lightest touch. Given the same quarries, neither Spartan nor Roman could have produced the same result. Attic genius gets world-wide recognition, not because it was fortunate in the material upon which it worked, but because it used what came to its hand with such transcendent insight into the possibilities of beauty in the unshaped stone."

Hebron, the Capital of King David will count for little with the young, who admire strength and courage. . . . As well as cleanliness of speech, I want to see every man able to hold his own with the strong, and also ashamed to oppress the weak. I want to see the young fellow able to do a man's work in the world, and of a type which will not permit imposition to be practised upon him. I want to see him too strong of spirit to submit to wrong, and, on the other hand, ashamed to do wrong to others. I want to see each man able to hold his own in the rough work of actual life outside, and also when he is at home, a good man, unselfish in dealing with wife, or mother, or children."

Men Who Overcome Obstacles

"Our business," said Robert Louis Stevenson, "is not to succeed, but to continue to fail in good spirits." The distinguished Professor Henry Drummond, when a student, failed twice to pass his undergraduate examination in science, but he was afterwards elected to fill the chair of natural science in Glasgow University.

Alexander H. Wyant, the famous American landscape painter, was still a young man when he joined in the spirit of enterprise a government exploring expedition in the West. The hardships of the life he led while thus employed shattered his health, and he returned to New York with his right hand completely paralyzed. His artistic genius, however, survived through months of suffering, and his courage was quite unbroken. After a while he learned to paint with his left hand, and produced pictures of scenes in the crown when he said: "There is laid for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day"; and also says, "and not to me only, but unto all also that love his appearing."

A French officer who was a prisoner upon his parole chanced to get hold of a Bible. He read it, and was so impressed with its contents that he was convinced of the folly of skeptical principles, and of the truth of Christianity, and he resolved to become Protestant. When his gay associates rallied him for taking so serious turn, he said in his vindication: "I have done no more than my old school fellow Bernadotte, who has become Lutheran." "Yes, but he became a said his associates, "to obtain crown." "My motive," said the Christian officer, "is the same; we only differ as to the place. The object of Bernadotte is to obtain a crown in Sweden; mine is to obtain a crown in heaven."

Some one on being asked, "What the kingdom of God answered with a hand on his heart a the other uplifted heaven. "It is something here, and something yonder." It also something between the Christian heart and heaven namely, the doing God's will on earth it is done in heaven the real, though not perfect, dominance Christ's law, the putting of service above salary, the Christianization of society in business, its politics and its pleasures.

The years of trial through which David waited for his promise crown are a beautiful illustration of the Christian looking forward through a life of trial to the crown of life promised to those who are faithful unto death. Anointed, but not yet crowned! not that the position of every Christian this world? And shall we not, as patiently as David, meet the affliction that come to us?

Let us look through the Bible with the theme of the heavenly crown in mind. A crown of righteousness laid up for men (II. Tim. 4: 8). Our crown of rejoicing (I. Thess. 2: 19). A crown of life which the Lord has promised to them that love him (James 1: 12). An unfading crown (I. Peter 5: 4). The crown must be striven for (II. Tim. 2: 5). The crown Jesus will wear in Heaven (Heb. 2: 9).

Called Higher

Rev. Dexter S. Foulkes, of Niobe, N. Y., was called higher Sunday, January 19, 1908, aged sixty-eight years. He was a veteran of the Civil War. He had been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for seven years. When not able to preach he was active in Christian work, having taught in the Sunday School for more than forty-five years.

Mrs. Elizabeth J. Davidson, of Mahomet, Ill., passed to her reward April 16, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Ducker, in Peoria, Ill. She was eighty-four years of age and had been a member of the Methodist Church for seventy-five years. She took great pleasure in providing for two famine orphans of India. She was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Sarah C. Scott, for many years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was called higher from her home in Van Nest Park, New York City. Mrs. Scott was the daughter of James and Sarah Macdougall. She was born in Renfrewshire, Scotland, May 21, 1861. Coming to this country with her parents when a child, she united at an early age with the Presbyterian church, of which she was for many years a faithful member. Her funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Maitland Bartlett, pastor of the West Farms Presbyterian Church, who took for his text the words "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith." Mrs. Scott was a woman of brave heart and sterling character.

TALKS ON THE COOL VERANDA

Children's Reading

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Unpaid Labor at Home

A TASTE for reading, if inborn, is a great gift. A child who loves to read is never at a loss for diversion, and seldom comes to a puzzled mother with the question, "What shall I do next?" Every mother knows, there are self-reliant children who can play and amuse themselves all day without reference to their elders, while there are others who have to be helped along every step of the way, whose dolls and toys and blocks are not enough for them unless some one else takes a hand and invents new turns of the game. The child who has learned to read, and to whom a story appeals, never knows a moment of ennui, and is usually contented and happy. With this child, the necessity is to provide good reading, and guard against bad. When one speaks of bad reading in reference to an immature mind, some distinctions may be made. For instance, one may very safely turn a child loose as one would turn a colt into pasture, in a library well stocked with standard English authors, both poets and novelists. Some of these may have been written in a coarse age when things were spoken and written about that would now be thought offensive and that are not mentioned in polite society. But the evil in these books floats from the mind of an innocent child without leaving an impression or a stain. Never yet was a child injured by the reading of Shakespeare. Occasionally one meets a parent who pleads in the interest of children for an expurgated Bible. King James's version from Genesis to Revelation has been read and studied by thousands of children, and it never did one child the least harm, while tens of thousands it has done infinite good.

Far more danger to children lurks either in literature carelessly made in their interest, in which the chief characters are little prigs or impossible saints and martyrs, or in sensational tales full of hair-breadth adventure that glorify in vice and crime. Somebody in the family or in a group of families should be responsible for the kind of books that are put into the hands of book-douring children. As much censorship should be exercised for food for the mind as over food for the body. The one item is as important as the other.

To cultivate in children a love of reading there should be reading aloud in the home circle. Long before the printed page with its wonderful symbols means anything to a small being still in the kindergarten, the ear may be caught by sounds as certainly as the eye is arrested by pictures. If father, mother or elder sister will only take time to read stories to children, and if children are allowed to sit in the circle when a magazine or newspaper is read for the entertainment of the older heads, imperceptibly a habit of listening to and caring for what books say will be formed. A home without books is not fully furnished for the education of children. Their shapes, their bindings, the care taken of them as possessions and the fact that they are prized by the people a child looks up to, help to sow in the new soil the seeds of culture. Read to the children, if you want them to love books; tell them fairy stories, if you would foster their imagination; teach them never to injure a book any more than they would hurt the feelings of a friend. Let the rule be with a new book always to bring it to the mother, and ask permission before they enter upon its reading. Teach children to be conscientious in the matter of borrowing and lending books.

By Way of Remembrance

A costly monument over the graves of our dead, a monolith in marble or granite, a mausoleum costing thousands of dollars, gratifies family pride and partly satisfies the craving of the bereaved to show honor to those who are gone. Few sights are sadder than that of a neglected grave, the long grass growing over it, with no sign given as to the personality of the sleeper under the sod. A modest stone with name and dates and perhaps a text of Scripture, a few flowers planted on the mound, the turf kept smooth and green, are enough to show that the dead are still dear and are not forgotten. By way of remembrance, those who can afford it would better do something for the living—furnish a room in a hospital, endow a bed, help a foreign missionary in his work, aid in a dispensary or a surgical ward, or found a scholarship in a college.

A LETTER that was opened one morning in the mail disclosed a state of things that is extremely common, as well as unjust, yet that arouses very little comment. A woman of thirty-five, in good health and with a good share of energy and brains, has spent her first youth in assisting her father and mother at home. She is a thorough housekeeper, understands the management of poultry, and has successfully raised flowers and vegetables. In the intervals of her busy domestic life, she has, by dint of study and perseverance, acquired a complete practical knowledge of the art of book-keeping. The early home has been sold and she is free to live her own life, take her small share of the estate left by her father and secure an independent foothold in a city, East or South. Never having had the opportunity to see anything outside the limits of her own State, and having spent most of her time within twenty miles of her home, she longs for a change. There would seem no objection to her doing as she pleases, but here a difficulty intervenes. A brother, living a few miles away, offers her a home and asks her to become a member of his family. He has an invalid wife who will be very glad of the sister's efficient and capable help. His circumstances will not permit him to pay her wages, but she will have board and lodging, a pleasant place of her own in the household, and, as he urges without a shade of hesitation, her own little income will be enough to furnish her clothes. What shall she do?

The people who know her are quite divided in sentiment. Her aunts and cousins are united in the opinion that she ought to go to brother James. Poor Frances really needs some one, and could not tolerate the idea of a stranger.

James has had so much expense in medicine and doctor's bills that, of course, he cannot afford to hire anyone, and it really seems providential that he has an able-bodied sister at liberty. An old friend who has known all parties concerned from childhood, and who belongs to the old-fashioned conventional type, affirms that it is much more respectable and dignified and more worthy a lady to live with one's relations than to go out in the world to earn one's living.

On the other hand, there are sensible acquaintances who, looking forward to the future, see the sister year by year growing older in the midst of drudgery which is not her own, and which for her has small returns in pleasure. She will be making heavy drains on her vitality, will pass the point in which she can easily find employment, will lose the facility of youth, and drift into the dreariness of a monotonous age without the chance to lay up any money, without the break of a single vacation.

The question is whether an unmarried woman has the right to look out for herself. James would never think of sending for a married sister and requesting her to leave her husband and home in his behalf. If his unmarried sister came to him, should she not do so as anyone else would on a business footing?

THE LOAN SHOP

AMONG the most pitiful glimpses of poverty and disappointment are those we get at the door of a pawn shop. Here, for instance, is tragedy hardly veiled in the person of a tottering old man led away by his little grandchild from the shop at which he has secured a trifling loan on an article left him from better days. It may have been a bit of jewelry or perhaps only a threadbare garment, and he may never be able to redeem it, but this day he and the child will have supper and lodging.

A Great Mission Founder Gone

REV. F. FRANSON, an earnest man of prayer, a tireless worker, and a devoted Christian, passed away lately at Idaho Springs, Col. He was born in Pershyttan (the Hut of Peter), near the city of Nora in the province of Westmanland, Sweden, June 17, 1852. He was converted more than thirty-six years ago. Since that time, he has faithfully served the Master, preaching the Gospel for thirty-three years, and preaching not only two or three times a week, but almost daily. He has preached the Gospel in nearly every part of the globe. He could preach in Swedish, Norwegian, German, French and English. He was also familiar with Latin and Greek.

Brother Franson came out of a warm Christian home. He received a good training, and an excellent education in the State college in Sweden. Especially was he interested in languages, for which he had a natural aptitude. His conversion in his twentieth year was like that of the apostle Paul—between God and himself. He was only seventeen years old when he came to this country with his parents and settled in Nebraska.

In the beginning of 1870, there was a great spiritual awakening in Sweden. People began to study their Bibles and a great revival swept over the land. This was felt not only in Sweden, but through newspapers and literature it spread to the Swedes in America. Brother Franson began to study the Bible, guided by the Holy Spirit. He was an ardent student of the prophecies, and the Lord's second coming was his great subject.

He met D. L. Moody in Chicago, and doubtless the evangelist made a great impression upon him. He was received as a member in Moody's Chicago Avenue Church, and remained a member of that church during his lifetime. His career has been followed with great interest, and by the prayers, both of the members of that church and of the students of the Moody Bible Institute. Mr. Franson was twenty-three years of age when he began his public ministry as a preacher of the Gospel. He traveled around the States for six years as an evangelist, winning many souls to God. During a part of this time, he paid especial attention to the work among the Mormons in Utah, and published a book against the Mormon follies. He was also the author of several books in the Swedish, German, and English languages. Most of these books have been translated into Norwegian. During his travels he also wrote a number of articles for Swedish newspapers in America, Sweden, and Germany.

In 1882, he went to Sweden and preached there with good results for two years. From Sweden he went to Norway and Denmark. In Denmark in 1885 he was arrested and held in jail for thirty-eight days on account of preaching the Gospel. In Germany also he preached with good results. From Germany he traveled to Switzerland, Greece, Palestine, and Egypt, preaching there in the German and French languages.

Returning to America, he began in 1890 to work more definitely and earnestly for the salvation of the heathen. In almost every city of the Union where a Swedish or Norwegian Free Church was established, he gave lectures to prepare young men and women for the foreign mission field. In 1891, he founded the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, his great life-work. The Mission sent in the same year thirty-five missionaries to China. The Alliance Mission has now branches in Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Finland, and has to-day 116 missionaries in China, Mongolia (where the Alliance Mission was the first to enter and establish mission stations), Japan, India, Africa, and South America. The Alliance Mission is undenominational and has its headquarters in Chicago, Ill. Its organization is similar to the China Inland Mission. The total income and expenses in 1907 were $36,000, all of which came from free contributions from Scandinavian churches in this country.

After founding the Alliance Mission, Brother Franson devoted his time exclusively to its work. He made two tours of the globe, visiting every station of the Alliance Mission. Recently he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He came home from a five-year round-the-world tour a little over a month ago, and had planned—after a period of rest in Colorado—to visit the Scandinavian churches in America. But while physically strong, he had overworked himself. On Saturday evening, August 1, he was apparently in his usual health, and intended to preach on the following Sunday; but suddenly he was taken ill on Sunday morning with hemorrhage of the brain, and before anything could be done he had passed away.

Rev. Mr. Franson was a gifted and spiritual man. He was a worker like Paul the Apostle, and died like a Christian soldier at his post. He was not a great orator, but a good Christian enthusiast. "He believed, therefore he spoke." He believed not only in God; he believed in man, too. His was that love which "seeketh not her own, thinketh no evil, and was not easily provoked." He was one of those that "believe all things, hope all things, and endure all things." He consecrated everything he possessed to the Master and his mission. Like Paul, he was not married. He was a man who "prayed without ceasing," a man of God, as few men are to-day. He was beloved by all true Christians with whom he came in contact.

His funeral took place on August 6 in Idaho Springs, Col. The remains were transferred to Esteina, Neb., where his parents also rest, awaiting the eternal glory on the resurrection morn. His work will be an inspiration to generations to come, to fully devote their lives to the Master's service.

The Gospel in the New Hebrides

REV. F. H. L. PATON, of the New Hebrides Mission, writes: "The last mail brings encouraging news in regard to the spiritual progress of the work, especially in Tanna, the island from which Turner and Nisbit were driven in 1848, and from which my father also was driven after four years of hardship and peril. For about fifty years the Tannese obstinately resisted all efforts to lead them to Christ. But about ten or twelve years ago the wild Tannese began to give way, and now about 4,000 of them are worshipers of Jesus Christ."

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend.

CHAPTER XXVIII

FRANK SPENCER found the mental atmosphere of Belcourt in confusion when he returned from his two days' trip. Margaret had repeated to Mrs. Merideth the substance of what McGinnis had told her, drawing a vivid picture of the little children wearing out their lives in plain sight of the windows of Belcourt. Mrs. Merideth had been shocked and dismayed, though she hardly knew which she deplored the more—that such conditions existed, or that Margaret should know of them. At Margaret's avowed determination to go over the mills, and into the operatives' houses, she lifted her hands in horrified protest, and begged her to report the matter to the Woman's Guild, and leave the whole thing in charge of the proper committees.

"But don't you see that they can't reach the seat of the trouble?" Margaret had objected. "Why, even that money which I intended for little Maggie went into a general fund, and never reached its specified destination." And Mrs. Merideth could only sigh and murmur:

"But, my dear, it's so unnecessary and so dreadful for you to mix yourself up personally with such people!"

When her brother came home, Mrs. Merideth went to him. Frank was a man; surely Frank could do something! But Frank merely grew white and stern, and went off into his own den, shutting himself up away from everybody. The next morning, after a fifteen-minute talk with Margaret, he sought his sister. His face was drawn into deep lines, and his eyes looked as if he had not slept.

"Say no more to Margaret," he entreated. "It is useless. She is her own mistress, of course, in spite of her insistence that I am still her guardian; and she must be allowed to do as she likes in this matter. Make her home here happy, and do not trouble her. We must not make her quite—hate us!" His voice broke over the last two words, and he was gone before Mrs. Merideth could make any reply.

It was just a day later that young McGinnis at the mills was summoned to the telephone.

"If you are not too busy," called a voice that sent a swift throbbing to the young man's pulse, "the other half of the committee would like to begin work. May she come down to the mills this afternoon at three o'clock?"

"By all means!" called back McGinnis. "Come." He tried to say more, but while he was searching for just the right words, the voice murmured "Thank you," and then the click of the receiver against the hook at the other end of the line.

The clock had not struck three that afternoon when Margaret was ushered into the inner office of Spencer & Spencer. Only Frank was there, for which Margaret was thankful.

Frank was expecting her, and only a peculiar tightening of his lips betrayed his disquietude as he turned to his desk and pressed the button that would summon McGinnis to the office.

"Miss Kendall would like to go over one of the mills," he said quietly, as the young man entered, in response to his ring. "Perhaps you will be her escort."

Margaret gave her guardian a grateful look as she left the office. She thought she knew just how much the calm acceptance of the situation had cost him, and she appreciated his unflinching determination to give her actions the sanction of his apparent consent. It was for this she gave him the grateful glance—but he did not see it. His head was turned away.

"And what shall I show you?" asked McGinnis, as the office door closed behind them.

"Everything you can," returned Margaret; "everything! But particularly the children."

From the first deafening click-clack of the rattling machines she drew back in consternation.

"They don't work there—the children!" she cried.

For answer he pointed to a little girl not far away. She was standing on a stool, that she might reach her work. Her face was thin and drawn looking, with deep shadows under her eyes, and little hollows where the roses should have been in her cheeks. Her hair was braided and wound tightly about her small head, though at the temples and behind her ears it kinked into rebellious curls that showed what it would like to do if it had a chance. Her ragged little skirts were tied round and round with a stout cord, so that the hungry jaws of the machine might not snap at any flying fold or tatter. She did not look up as Margaret paused beside her. She dared not. Her eyes were glued to the whizzing, whirling, clattering thing before her, watching for broken threads or loose ends, the neglect of which might bring down upon her head a snarling reprimand from "de boss" of her department.

Margaret learned many things during the next two hours. Conversation was not easy in the clattering din, but some few things her guide explained, and a word or two spoke volumes sometimes.

Do You Hear Well?

The Stolz Electrophone—A New, Scientific and Practical Invention for Those Who Are Deaf or Partially Deaf—May Now be Tested in Your Own Home.

For partially deaf people may now make a month's trial of the Stolz Electrophone at home. This is an important news for the deaf, for by this plan a final selection of the one completely satisfactory hearing aid is made easy and inexpensive for everyone.

This new invention (U. S. Patent No. 762,355) renders unnecessary such clumsy, unsightly and frequently harmful devices as trumpets, horns, tubes, ear drums, fans, etc. It is a tiny electric telephone that fits on the ear, and which, the instant it is applied, magnifies the sound waves in such manner as to cause an astonishing increase in the clearness of all sounds. It overcomes the buzzing and roaring ear noises, and also so constantly and electrically exercises the vital parts of the ear that, usually, the natural, unaided hearing itself is gradually restored.

What Three Business Men Say
The Electrophone is very satisfactory. Being small in size, it is a great hearing quality makes it preferable to any I have heard of, I believe, I have tried all of them. M. W. HOYT, Wholesale Grocer, Michigan Ave. and River St., Chicago.
I am so glad I could not hear with my speaking tube and advised to try the Electrophone. After fifteen years of stress, discomfort and worry, I now hear perfectly at church and at concerts. W. R. UTLEY, Sales Manager, S. A. Maxwell & Co., Chicago.

I have now used your Electrophone over a year, and know it is a first-class, scientific hearing device. Without it I have to shout directly in my ear to make myself heard. Best of all, it has stopped my head noises, which was a terrible aggravation. LOUIS W. MAY, Cashier, 100 Wabington Street, Chicago.

TRIED TO FORCE IT

Thought System Would Soon Tolerate Coffee.

A Boston lady tried to convince herself that she could get used to coffee, and finally it was the stronger. She writes:

"When a child, being delicate and nervous, was not allowed coffee. But since reaching manhood I began its use, and as the habit grew on me, I frequently endeavored to break myself of it, because of its evident bad effects. With me the most noticeable effect of inking coffee was palpitation of the heart. This was at times truly alarming, and my face would flush uncomfortably and maintain a vivid hue for some time.

"I argued that my system would soon accustom itself to coffee, and continued to use it, although I had a suspicion that it was affecting my eye-sight, also. The kidneys finally showed effects of coffee, as I found by having it off for a few days, when the trouble abated.

"Finally a friend called my attention to Postum. At first I did not like it, but when I had boiled 15 minutes until dark and rich it soon found Postum was just what I wanted. No flushing of the face, no palpitation, no discomfort or inconvenience after inking it.

"Of course all this was not felt in a week or two weeks, but within that time I can truthfully say a marked difference had taken place and a great deal of my nervousness had vanished.

"At present time my health is excellent, due to a continued use of Postum, with a general observance of proper hygiene. Of thing am I more convinced than that if I continued drinking coffee, I should be a day little less than a nervous wreck, and possibly blind.

"There's a reason."

She saw what it meant to be a "doffer," a "reeler," a "silk-twister." She saw what it might mean if the tiny hand that thrust the empty bobbin over the buzzing spindle-point should slip or lose its skill. She saw a little maid of twelve who earned two whole dollars a week; and she saw a smaller girl of ten who, McGinnis said, was with her sister the only support of an invalid mother at home. She saw more, much more, until her mind refused to grasp details and the whole scene became one blurred vision of horror.

Later, after a brief rest—she insisted upon staying—she saw the "day-shift" swarm out into the cold winter night, and the "night-shift" come shivering in to take their places; and she grew faint and sick when she saw among them the scores of puny little forms with their tired-looking faces and dragging feet.

"And they're only beginning!" she moaned, as McGinnis hurried her away. "And they've got to work all night—all night!"

CHAPTER XXIX

MARGARET did not sleep well in her lavender-scented sheets that night. Always she heard the roar and the click-clack of the mills, and everywhere she saw the weary little workers with their closely-bound skirts and their strained, anxious faces.

She came down to breakfast with dark circles under her eyes, and she ate almost nothing, to the great, though silent, distress of the family.

The Spencers were alone now. There would be no more guests for a week, then would come a merry half-dozen for the Christmas holidays. New Year's was the signal for a general breaking up. The family seldom stayed at Belcourt long after that, though the house was not quite closed, being always in readiness for the brothers when either one or both came down for a week's business.

It was always more or less of a debatable question—just where the family should go. There was the town house in New York, frequently opened for a month or two of gayety; and there were the allurements of some Southern resort, or of a trip abroad, to be considered. Sometimes it was merely a succession of visits that occupied the first few weeks after New Year's, particularly for Mrs. Merideth and Ned; and sometimes it was only a quiet rest under some sunny sky entirely away from Society with a capital S. The time was drawing near now for the annual change, and the family were discussing the various possibilities when Margaret came into the breakfast room. They appealed to her at once, and asked her opinion and her advice—but without avail. There seemed to be not one plan that interested her to the point of possessing either merits or demerits.

"I am going down to Patty's," she said a little hurriedly to Mrs. Merideth, when breakfast was over. "I got some names and addresses of the mill children yesterday from Mr. McGinnis; and I shall ask Patty to go with me to see them. I want to talk with the parents."

"But, my dear, you don't know what you are doing," protested Mrs. Merideth. "They are so rough—those people. Miss Alby, our visiting home missionary, told me only last week how dreadful they were—so rude and intemperate and—and ill-odored. She has been among them. She knows."

"Yes; but don't you see?—those are the very people that need help then," returned Margaret, wearily. "They don't know what they are doing to their little children, and I must tell them. I must tell them. I shall have Patty with me. Don't worry." And Mrs. Merideth could only sigh and sigh again, and hurry away up stairs to devise an altogether more delightful plan for the winter months than any that had yet been proposed—a plan so overwhelmingly delightful that Margaret could not help being interested. Of one thing, however, Mrs. Merideth was certain—if there was a place distant enough to silence the roar of the mills in Margaret's ears, that place should be chosen, if it were Egypt itself.

Patty Durgin hesitated visibly when Margaret told her what she wanted to do, until Margaret exclaimed in surprise, and with a little reproach in her voice:

"Why, Patty, don't you want to help me?"

"Yes, yes, you don't understand," protested Patty. "It ain't that. I want ter do it all. If you have money for 'em, let me give it to 'em."

Margaret was silent. Her eyes were still hurt, still rebellious.

"I—I don't want you ter see 'em," stammered Patty, then. "I don't want you ter feel so—so bad."

Margaret's face cleared.

"Oh, but I'm feeling bad now," she asserted cheerily, "and after I see them I'll feel better. I want to talk to them; don't you see? They don't realize what they are doing to their children to let them work so, and I am going to tell them."

Patty sighed.

"You don't understand," she began, then stopped, her eyes on the determined young face opposite. "All right, I'll go," she finished, but she shivered a little as she spoke.

And they did go, not only on that day, but on the next and the next. Margaret almost forgot the mills, so filled was her vision now with the drunken men, untidy women, wretched babies, and cheerless homes.

Sometimes her presence and her questions were resented, and always they were looked upon with distrust. Her money, if she gave that, was welcome, usually; but her remonstrances and her warnings fell on deaf, if not angry, ears. And then Margaret perceived why Patty had said she did not understand—there was no such thing as making a successful appeal to the parents. She might have spared herself the effort.

Sometimes she did not understand the words of the dark-browed men and the slovenly women—there were many nationalities among the operatives—but always she understood their black looks and their almost threatening gestures. Occasionally, to be sure, she found a sick woman or a discouraged man who welcomed her warmly, and who listened to her and agreed with what she had to say; but with them there was always the excuse of poverty—though their Sue and Bess and Teddy might not earn but twenty, thirty, forty cents a day, yet that twenty, thirty and forty cents would buy meat and bread, and meant all the difference between a full and an empty stomach, perhaps, for every member of the family.

Margaret did what she could. She spent her time and her money without stint, and went from house to house untiringly. She summoned young McGinnis to her aid, and arranged for a monster Christmas tree to be placed in the largest hall in town; and she herself ordered the books, toys, candies and games for it, besides the candles and tinsel stars to make it a vision of delight to the weary little eyes all unaccustomed to such glory. And yet to Margaret it seemed that nothing that she did counted in the least against the much there was to be done. It was as if a child with a teaspoon and a bowl of sand were set to filling up a big chasm; her spoonful of sand had not even struck bottom in that pit of horror!

DAVID'S DOUBLE KINGDOM

By MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER the death of Ishbosheth, Saul's son, whom Abner, Saul's commander-in-chief, had anointed king, nothing more stood in the way of David to the throne of all Israel. It was now fifteen years since Samuel had anointed him at Bethlehem in his father's house. For all these years Saul persisted in his claim to regal power, and to human eyes David's life was continually in danger; and for seven and a half years, since the death of Saul, David had reigned only over Judah, all the other tribes continuing to adhere to the house of Saul. But now the trial of David's faith in this matter was at an end. "Then came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying: 'Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh.'"

Strange that they had not found it out before! But it is just so with Jesus, the Son of David. How many ears some of us know him as a Saviour before we crown him as our King?

David was thirty when he began to reign in Hebron, which would make him twenty-two when he was first anointed by Samuel, and thirty-seven when he was made king over all Israel. More than two-thirds of his life had been passed in waiting for the fulfillment of God's promises, while the discipline through which he went was educating him for his future work and life. He was God's chosen king before he was man's; he reigned to carry out God's thoughts, not his own. The city of Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was in the hands of the Jebusites. In Joshua's time the children of Israel had fought against Jerusalem, taken it, smitten it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire; but they did not do all which God commanded. Why could David do what theirs could not do? He believed in his divine commission, and counted the will of God, which he was carrying out, stronger than the will and purposes of the strongest foes.

The success of David incensed the Philistines. David had made grievous mistakes in his relations with the Philistines, and had led Achish, king of Gath, to believe that he was the enemy of Israel and the friend of the Philistines, and for the honor of God he must now show his colors, and prove in which side he was. He did not take his cue from the Philistines, and review his troops, but he went to inquire of the Lord. "And the Lord said, Go up; for I will doubtless deliver the Philistines into thine hand." This was enough; he had God's word for it, and could lead his mighty men forward, certain to conquer. He "came to Baalperazim, and . . . smote them here." The Philistines had left their images behind them, having probably brought them into the field under a superstitious idea that they would help in conquering Israel, and David and his men burned them. Whatever leads to sin must be destroyed. If we loathe sin, we shall loathe all that has ever led to it, all which brings up the memory, all which suggests or provokes to sin.

After their defeat, the Philistines did not succumb, but "came up yet again, and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim. David did as the Lord had commanded him, and smote them from Geba to Gaza. Now they were driven to the narrow strip by the seacoast, which they still held.

In this history, there is a beautiful and most evident typical teaching. Jesus is our David, anointed of God, and recognized by him as king over our hearts and lives long before we know and own him as such. While Saul, the type of self, still reigns, David lives, but is hardly tolerated. While we are busy with thoughts and plans about our work, and we pray earnestly and vigorously that God will help us, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David; self is supreme, and God comes in only as a helper. While we are eager in our determination to drive out certain sins, and we fight and struggle, pray and wrestle against them, we are in the list against the foe, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David. When we pray with all our might, and urge our requests with a zeal which would give an unbeliever the idea that it was a hard thing to prevail with God, and that an answered prayer was a rarity, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David. When we are touchy as to the way in which man looks upon our work, and we seek for sympathy and help, comfort and compassion from man, it is the reign of Saul, and not of David.

Answered Prayers

LORD, teach our hearts to pray,
Even tho' our lips be dumb,
Oh bend our wills thy way
Till gracious answers come.
Thou dost delight to give
Thy children what is best.
Then teach us how to live,
And trust thee for the rest.

O Lord, thyself draw near,
Indite each humble prayer,
Banish each earth-born fear,
And charm away our care.
To thee the ravens cry
For answers in their need,
And wilt thou not reply
When we in meekness plead?

Thy promises are grand,
Thy time, thy way is best;
What we have committed to thy hand
Will surely bear the test.
"Is anything too hard?"
For thine almighty power?
Then help us leave with thee
The burden of the hour.

NIGHT NURSE

Kept in Perfect Trim by Right Food

Nursing the sick is often very burdensome to the nurse.

Night nursing is liable to be even more exhausting from the fact that the demands of the system for sleep are more urgent during the night hours.

A Va. lady, called on to act as night nurse in the family, found the greatest support from the use of Grape-Nuts food. She says: "Our acquaintance with Grape-Nuts began eight years ago. We bought the first package sold in this place, and although we began as skeptics we became converts to its striking food value."

"I used Grape-Nuts first, to sustain me when doing night nursing for a member of the family. I ate a teaspoonful at a time, and by slowly chewing it, I was able to keep awake and felt no fatigue."

"Soon I grew to like Grape-Nuts very much, and after our patient recovered I was surprised to find that I was not at all 'worn out' on account of broken rest. My nerves were strong and steady and my digestion fine. This was the more surprising because I had always suffered with weak nerves and indigestion. My experience was so satisfactory that other members of the family took up Grape-Nuts with like results." "There's a Reason."

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

I. A., East Haddam, Conn. Will we be justified in spending the Sabbath in going on excursions or in worldly amusements—traveling on business to save time, etc.?

No. The moral law is as binding to-day as when it was delivered. Desecration of the Lord's Day is a sin that will have to be accounted for. It is a growing evil which every right-minded person should oppose.

W. J., Richmond, Va. 1. What does "born of water" mean in St. John 3: 5? 2. Do you think a child arriving at the years of accountability (say twelve or fifteen), a professing Christian, but never baptized, and dying, would be saved?

1. It was announcing that a cleansing or purifying of the Spirit in any one is indispensable to entrance into the Kingdom of God. The symbol of water had already been used as an initiatory ordinance by John the Baptist, and in the Christian Church it was soon to become the visible door of entrance. 2. There is no limit to God's love and forgiveness.

M. W. S., De Land, Fla. I notice in THE MAIL-BAG, among the questions answered, that the writer seems to have some trouble to locate the Prodigal Son. May not Israel of the ten tribes fitly represent the Prodigal Son, as he seems to be a historical personage? Samaria, the capital of Israel, was in the country of Ephraim; he was one generation younger than Judah, the Jew. God the Father divided to Israel the larger part of the landed estate. To Judah was given the homestead, the Temple at Jerusalem. Not many days after—soon after—the younger son went into Assyria, where he wasted his substance in joining a citizen, a Gentile, herding swine and feeding on "husks." The mighty famine foretold by the prophet was on him. (Amos 8: 11.) In our Lord's time he began to be in want, but came to himself under the Gospel. Israel was then willing to be a servant and was made a son. (Rom. 8: 16.) In the Gospel they began to be merry in a feast of fat things. The end of the feast has not yet been reached. The Jew, the elder son, has long been entreated to come in. Will he not come soon?

W. D. P., Summit, N. J. In what year did John C. Colt kill Wheeler, and then commit suicide the night before the day set for his execution?

September, 1841. It was not Wheeler but Samuel Adams who was killed by Colt. Wheeler gave the information that led to Colt's arrest.

W. L., Raeford, N. C. Please explain John 14: 12. What "greater works" could the disciples do?

Not greater in the sense of being more glorious or transcendent than the miracles wrought by Jesus, but in the sense of being broader and more far-reaching. Jesus began the work which they were to be spiritually endowed to carry forward. Their special work was to be the spreading of the Gospel abroad after his ascension, and the glorious ingathering of souls which Jesus foresaw was to take place under their direction. He would not conduct this wider campaign personally, because he must go to the Father, but he would endue them with all power to accomplish this wonderful work which he had laid out for them. See Luke 5: 10; John 1: 51. Thus far they had been in training under his care; thenceforth they would be equipped as master workmen for the upbuilding of the Kingdom.

D. W., Easton, Pa. Astronomers tell us that it takes a certain number of seconds for light to travel from a certain planet to the earth, and that by knowing the time, they are able to compute the distance from the earth to that planet. Now how do they get at the time of the starting of the light from the said planet? We can say, a balloon will travel from New York to Boston in two hours; but we must have the correct time of the starting, and this can be given only by one present at the time of starting.

It is hardly correct to say that astronomers determine the distance to the planets, or other objects in the heavens, by the time it requires light to traverse the space. They rather use these statements as an illustration of the distance. The distance itself is determined in other ways. These measurements are mathematical. The distance of objects in our solar system can generally be determined by a parallax. It is impossible in the space of this column to explain the various methods employed. Once the distance is ascertained, and knowing the speed of light, it is easy to determine the time of its passage. A statement of the time brings to the mind a conception of the distance, but the time has little to do with primarily determining it. To do this every means is employed—eclipses, conjunctions of planets or stars, angles of all degrees, celestial photography and other means—to confirm the results. When it is said, for instance, that light comes from the moon to us in about a second and a quarter of time, and from the sun in about eight minutes, and from Alpha Centauri, our nearest star, in about four and one-half years, the mind is greatly aided in grasping the conception (if it cannot grasp the fact), of the distances implied. In this sense it is used by writers on astronomy.

PROF. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND, Seabreeze, Fla.

Mrs. W. J. S., Tryon, N. C. How many dollars were the thirty pieces of silver for which Judas betrayed Christ worth?

According to the best commentators, the pieces were doubtless shekels. The Jewish shekel of the sanctuary (stater or siclus) was of about the value of fifty-five cents of our money. In those days, however, the purchasing power must have been much greater. Thirty shekels was the price of a slave.

M., Steamboat Springs, Colo., apropos of the question of W. N., Belleville, N. Y., as to the best proof of immortality, writes: "The best proof, in my opinion, of the immortality of the soul, is from the ancients, presumably the last conversation of Socrates before he drank the hemlock cup. He is quoted as saying: 'To everything there is a special vice of infirmity attached, by which, malefactors as Dismas (the repentant) and Gestas, and the former is to-day honored as a saint in the Syrian, Greek and Latin churches. Luke's account of the crucifixion is more exact than any of the other Gospels. He is a close observer and enters more into detail.

G. U. Y., Cambridge, Mass. Should the offering in church be taken in silence, or be accompanied by singing little solos, or the whole choir? Our ministers say when the offering is about to be taken, "Let us continue to worship God in the act of making an offering," and the organ peals forth and singing keeps up until the offering is brought back and presented.

It may be an innovation in your church, but it is not uncommon to have music played softly during the taking of the offering. We have seen missionary meetings where under the inspiration of suitable music (missionary hymns, etc.) large sums were raised. It does not seem to us to be out of place on such occasions. For the regular offering, music might be omitted; but its use could not be regarded in any sense as an impropriety.

A. L. R., Cochran, Pa. How many sons had Jesse? In I. Sam. 17: 12 it says he had eight, and in I. Chron. 2: 13-15, it names seven sons.

He had eight sons. See I. Sam. 16: 10, 11, and chap. 17: 12. See also Josephus, Antiquities, the chapter immediately preceding. In the part of that chapter, it is made very clear that those who made great sacrifice and render service will be suitably recompensed. The vineyard parable, on the other hand, is a rebuke to those who, forgetting that all rewards here will be of pure grace and not of merit, will murmur because the late comers are as well and as well rewarded as many who have worked in the heat of the day.

Reader, Mt. Carroll, Ill. 1. Was Bishop Taylor's work a failure? 2. When and where did he die? 3. Was he a Methodist?

1. No, it was a great and successful work. He labored in California, Australia, India, the Congo, Angola and Liberia. He founded many missions in Africa which are now conducted by Bishop Hartzell. 2. In California several years ago. 3. Yes.

J. T. G., Bedford Station, N. Y. Was Laza resurrected or resuscitated? Paul says I. Cor. 15: 20: "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that sleep."

The apostle speaks of the death of the Christ as a sleep, using the word figuratively. Laza had been dead four days.

A. J. H., Wilkesburg, Pa. What is meant by word "man" in Isa. 32: 2?

Eminent scholars make the passage read: "Man" (Christ), the Hebrew ish meaning eminent as a man. It was as the Son of man suffered, and as the Son of man he is to reign.

AN EXTENDED OPPORTUNITY

A FEW weeks ago we offered our readers Peary's magnificent book "NEAREST THE POLE," at less than half the publisher's price. Since then we have been called upon to fill dozens upon dozens of orders, but, for the benefit of those who may have wished to take advantage of this opportunity and, for one reason or another, were unable to do so at the time, we again print the substance of our offer. For details refer to our issue of July 29 and August 5.

The cost of manufacture makes the publisher's price for this superb volume $4.80; our price to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is $2.

We do this, not because we have a hand a number of copies of the book which we are anxious to dispose of, but because we wished to bring "the book of the hour"—a book, moreover, that will be more and more talked of until the outcome of Peary's present expedition to the North Pole is determined—within reach of all our readers. So, by making special arrangements with the publishers, we are able to offer you Nearest the Pole, one of the most exquisitely printed and absorbingly interesting books that has ever been published, at the nominal price of $2.

The volume measures, when open 15 3/4 x 10 1/2 inches, weighs four pounds is printed on De Luxe paper, with a rich gold stamp binding and is beautifully illustrated with ninety half-tone sepia engravings—forty-five of which are full pages—at the nominal price of $2. We cannot, however, in this instance, prepay express charges.

If you live within five hundred miles of New York, have the book sent charges collect; but, if you live at a greater distance send us 35 cents (in addition to the price of the volume) to cover cost of transportation.

THE RUINS OF THE FAMOUS ZEPPELIN AIRSHIP

As already described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Count Zeppelin's flight in his airship number four came to a disastrous end, the balloon being struck by lightning and burned. Every one had heard that the balloon was as long as an Atlantic liner, but not until the skeleton lay on the ground, a forlorn wreck, was it possible to realize how tremendous were the proportions of the machine. The photograph shows the appearance of the giant airship after the fire. A public fund is being raised to enable Count Zeppelin to continue his experiments.

and which alone, that thing can be destroyed. Thus, blindness destroys the eyesight; mildew destroys corn, and rot destroys timber. The peculiar infirmities attached to the soul are injustice, intemperance, cowardice, ignorance, wickedness. Can these bring about the dissolution of the soul? No. Certainly not; for they cannot destroy the soul immediately, as a disease destroys the body; though they may be, mediately, the cause of a man's being put to death by other people; which is quite a different thing. But if wickedness does not destroy the soul, nothing else can; therefore, the soul is immortal."

L. M., Alice, Texas. Is it right to accept money for any service rendered on the Lord's Day? For instance, money from a day-boarder? Is it right to charge on the Sabbath?

Certainly it is right. All works of necessity and mercy are right on that day, and food is a necessity, and has to be paid for. You should not make the Lord's Day a day of business accountings, however, and obligations incurred on that day should be settled on a week day. There should be no buying and selling on the Sabbath.

H. D. S., Pittsburg, Pa. Why is the dying thief repenting on the cross mentioned only by one (Luke) of the four Gospels?

The incident (as told in Luke's Gospel) was one that was well known to the early Christian Church. One account gave the names of the two book 6, chap. 8, which gives the names of all but the eldest, who was first put forward by Jesse before the prophet. The names of the six between the oldest and youngest are given as Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah, Nathanael, Rael, Asa.

A. D., Oakland, Ore. 1. In the Bible we are told not to eat swine's flesh. Why do so many Christian people eat pork? 2. I have read in several papers that it was bad luck to wear opals during your birth month. Is there anything in it?

1. Pork is forbidden as food under the Mosaic law, and there are many besides the Jews who hold that swine's flesh is unfit for human food. 2. The ill-luck of the opal is an old superstition. The Greeks called it the keranos, and believed it produced thunder. In the middle ages it was said that the opal grew pale and dim on the approach of poison, and was thus a forerunner of death. Empress Josephine attributed her misfortunes to the possession of a cluster of opals. Of course, these are all mere superstitions, born of ignorance.

H. J. B., Luxor, Pa. 1. Paul in the passage in I. Thessalonians, chap. 5, is describing the resurrection of the dead saints, whose bodies remain in the grave until the Second Coming of Christ, at which time the bodies glorified and no longer corruptible (see I. Cor. 15: 35-49), will be reunited with the spirit. 2. The parable of the laborers in the vineyard should be read in connection with

Esther Denounces Haman to King Ahasuerus

South Porch of the Reception Hall

IN "SHUSHAN THE PALACE"

By PROF. EDGAR J. BANKS

IN ALL literature there are few tales more beautiful or touching than the simple story of Esther, the Jewish maid who became the queen of Ahasuerus in Shushan the Palace. It has often been said that the story sounds like a fairy tale; that its scene is laid in a land far too distant from the scene of Bible history to give it the appearance of truth; that its descriptions of the feast stamp it as Oriental imagination, and that of all the Persian kings none bore the name Ahasuerus. The modern explorer may now say that in all Hebrew literature there is no picture with purer Oriental coloring; that there is nothing in the story which may not well be true; that the royal excavations at Susa have revealed the magnificence which the story describes, and that the name Ahasuerus is but a corruption of the name of the great Persian king Xerxes. At Susa, or Shush, or as the Hebrew author said, in Shushan the Palace, Xerxes lived, surrounded with marvelous wealth and magnificence, and from the ancient inscriptions we know that in the third year of his reign he gave a feast to all his princes. In this very palace in which he gave the feast to Queen Esther, most interesting excavations have been made. In the level plains of the Persian province Susiana, which, like lower Babylonia, have now been turned to swamps by the overflowing river, the explorer seldom finds a village or even a mud hut, yet in ancient times on the shore of the Kerkha there stood the city of Shush, with the palace in which the Persian kings made their winter home. Of the three mounds into which the royal buildings have turned, the loftiest the citadel in which the French have discovered the famous stone of the Hammurabi code. A second mound, somewhat lower, yet far more extensive, conceals the royal residence; the third contains the banquet hall, a building which the Persians called the Apadana, and which is the scene of the story of the book of Esther. Not far from the mounds and surrounded by swamps, and a tomb in which the fanatical Moslems of the country believe that the biblical Daniel is buried; indeed, in the book of Daniel, we read that it was at Shushan in the palace, by the river, that Daniel saw the vision of the succeeding dynasties. Whether this tomb is authentic, or merely the creation of the imaginative Moslem pilgrims, none can say.

In the year 1852, Mr. Loftus, then a member of an English commission appointed to determine the boundary line between Turkey and Persia, visited the ruins of Susa. Digging a few trenches into the mounds, he revealed the bases of columns upon which were engraved long inscriptions in three languages written in the wedge-shape character. One of the languages was ancient Persian. Its translation, a part of which is as follows, tells the history of the building and fixes it at once as Shushan the Palace of the book of Esther.

Thus says Artaxerxes, the great king, the king of kings, the king of all the countries that are upon the earth, the son of Darius, the son of Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes, the son of Darius, the son of Hystaspes. My ancestor Darius built this Apadana in former times. In the reign of my grandfather it was consumed by fire; I have restored it.

Thus is identified the palace in which the royal banquet was given to Queen Esther. It was built by Darius, 521-485 B.C., burned during the reign of Artaxerxes, 464-425 B.C., and restored by Artaxerxes, 406-359. This discovery in the swamps of distant Persia is of scarcely less interest to the Bible student than the uncovering of the palaces at Nineveh. Loftus sought permission to continue his excavations there, but the fanatical natives, jealous of the tomb of Daniel, which they regarded as too sacred to be polluted by the presence of a Christian, made it impossible.

It remained for a Frenchman, M. Marcel Dieulafoy, and his wife to uncover the banquet hall. In 1884 Dieulafoy went to Persia, requested the Persian government to permit the excavation of Susa, and was refused; again he asked, and only by persuading the Shah that the excavations would reveal the glory of his royal ancestors, was the permission finally granted. The excavations were begun on March 1, 1885, and though within two weeks Dieulafoy was recalled by the Persian government, he continued with his work. Armed bands of fanatics then marched to drive him away before he should violate the tomb of Daniel, but he quieted them and finally he was left in peace. The marvelous structure which the book of Esther calls Shushan the Palace, and which the Persians called the Apadana, had not transformed itself, like the Babylonian palaces, into mounds of disintegrated mud bricks. Its walls of a white marble-like limestone were still standing, and little but the roof had entirely fallen. It was therefore not difficult to determine the plan of the vast structure, or to picture it as it was in the days of Xerxes when its beautiful enamel and soft hangings and rich carpetings beautified it. Imagine a huge square hall whose flat roof of great cedar beams was supported by thirty-six stone columns arranged in rows of six, with the three sides of the building walled up and the fourth left open, and you have a picture of the main part of the palace. The two sides of the large hall were flanked with porticoes supported by columns, and at the rear was the smaller apartment extending the entire width of the hall. At the two rear corners were pylons surmounted with battlements.

Such was the general form of the banquet hall of King Ahasuerus. The material of which it was built was a native white stone resembling marble, but dark when polished. The floors were paved with brick, the stucco walls

The Reproach of the Troubled

TEXT—MARK 4: 38:
"Master, carest thou not that we perish?"

JESUS had been preaching all day long. There never was such a preacher as he. No other man ever compressed in a few sentences such immortal meaning. Even in the brief summaries of his discourses which are preserved, there is so much force and power and majesty, so much tenderness and peace, so much light and life and love, together with so much brilliance in illustration and example, that we can well imagine what they must have been in full. And those who have had any practice in public speaking can realize what they must have cost him. He spoke with the mental and spiritual insight of God, but with the physical and material strength of man, and although he was never violent, he must often have been tired out, exhausted. Night, with its promise of repose, was as welcome to him as to any weary man.

He withdraws himself from the multitude which had drained his vitality through the long day of teaching, and when even comes, enters into one of the small fishing boats with which the lake abounds, intending to pass over to the other side to the country of the Gadarenes, where perhaps he hopes to be able further to spread his Gospel. His disciples dismiss the crowd and follow him into the little boat, in no proper sense a ship as we understand it, for it was probably so small that it could scarcely contain them all. Some other chosen companions and friends embark in other ships to follow the Master to the other side.

Jesus, being very tired, lies down in the stern of the ship. He rests his head against an improvised pillow, probably made of the outer garments of some of the men, and goes sound asleep. It adds a touch of human tenderness to the picture of the Divine Son of God whenever we read of him as fulfilling the ordinary destinies of men. As a tired man sleeps for rest, so slept the Lord in the ship.

The Tempest Rages

The passage, which should have been a short one under favorable circumstances, was not made without an adventure. One of those sudden tempests, squalls of wind and rain, to which the lake—"that deep hollow in the earth's surface"—was liable, and which still prevail on occasion over those same waters, sprang up. It is astonishing how rough a small body of water can become in a sudden gale. Still waters run deep; the mighty ocean does not immediately respond to the pressure of the wind, and it does not immediately become stilled when the wind dies away. But in shallow waters spread over large areas there is a prompt response to every atmospheric disturbance.

The fishermen watched with increasing apprehension the quick and growing blackness of the sky. I think it likely that the other boats went back to the harbor in fear of the storm, but the ship which carried Jesus held its course. The experienced among the disciples scanned eagerly the distant shore and sought to reassure their brethren with the hope that they would make a landing on the other side before the tempest broke upon them. The whirlwind was swifter than their hopes, for in a moment the little boat was wildly tossing in a rough and tumbling sea. Heavy laden perhaps, she did not ride as lightly as was her wont, and the buffeting waves broke over her bows, the drenching spray was blown aft and they were in dire peril for their lives in the sudden and heavy seas, while Jesus calmly slept on.

The sleep of a working man or woman should be sacred. Rest is one of the most necessary as well as one of the most precious gifts of God. One of the most gracious promises is that "there remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God that shall be forever." The supreme desire of many a tired soul is just to rest. "In the sweet fields of Eden, there is rest for the weary." Sleep is a great mystery which no one has explained, although wise philosophers have reasoned about it and speculated upon it almost as much as they have speculated upon the greater and longer sleep we call death. But this we know, in sleep we rest. Perhaps in death, too, we rest. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord: even so, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors."

The disciples were all working men. No idler, no dilettante, no trifler in the world's battle could be a chosen companion of the Christ. For Jesus, too, was a working man. We think of to-day as the most strenuous period in the world's history because we live in it. But life was just as earnest and just as real then as now, and men craved and needed then the "sleep that knits up the raveled sleeve of care" just as they do to-day. The Master was asleep and resting tranquilly in the storm. Jesus was tired out. Not one of those men would have disturbed him for a slight cause.

Safe with Jesus

And again, although they lived in the most tender and intimate relationship with Christ; although, so far as we can discern, he lived with them in the utmost frankness and freedom of perfect love, they were never familiar with him. It is inconceivable that they ever could have been. Even Judas betrayed him with a kiss of respect. There was always a difference between him and them, a great gulf, bridged by love, his love more than theirs, but which nevertheless intervened. There was awe in the hearts of those who stood before him. I have no more doubt that even Caiaphas feared him than I have that Pilate hesitated and trembled before him. Much more these disciples. On no account would they have awakened him unless they had the gravest reason for so doing. "The king sleeps" was the word that was wont to hush the palace into silence. But peril, danger, were at hand; the king must be awakened.

Again we are met with the failure of the disciples to comprehend Jesus. We are surprised at their blindness when we consider him from our present point of view, with our present illumination, but we need scarcely be, if we put ourselves in the places of those men. They could not realize who and what this Christ really was; it was simply impossible for them to do so. Had they realized it fully, I dare to believe there would have been no crucifixion. The power of such a realization would have been as irresistible then as it was when Peter braved the crucifiers after the resurrection, or when Paul won a world after his enlightenment. And perhaps their eyes were holden that the great sacrifice might be accomplished.

Therefore these terrified men in that small boat in danger of being swamped, while they were fully persuaded of the divinity of Christ in some strange and different way from the divinity of any other child of God, could not completely understand. They had not learned that with Jesus they were safe no matter what threatened or what happened.

"Fear not," said the great Roman to the trembling boatman in the midst of the storm; "you shall be safe, for you carry Cæsar and his fortunes." And a greater than Cæsar was here.

The Master's Rebuke

Not all the storms that ever blew on all the waters of the world could have sunk that ship that carried Jesus and his brethren. No deluge that may come from the broken fountains of the greatest deep will sink that great ship, the church, which to-day carries Jesus and his brethren. But those men did not know that.

The breaking waves dashed high over the bow of that little vessel, the water came flooding aft, and Jesus slept on. The Master lay asleep in the hinder part of the ship and gave no heed. Who broke his slumber and awakened him? Mark has the fullest account. Was it Peter who laid a timorous hand upon his shoulder and shook him and poured into his ear the cry, which was also a reproach, "Master, carest thou not that we perish?"

"And Jesus arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, Peace, be still. And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. And he said unto them, Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith? And they feared exceedingly, and said one to another, What manner of man is this, that commandeth the wind and the sea obey him?"

I think no human touch can improve upon the exquisite simplicity, the noble dignity of that account. I see the standing figure of the Saviour, I mark the huddling, terrified disciples, their clothes drenched, shivering with terror, maintaining an uneasy footing on the bark, unsteady, tempest-tossed. I hear that voice calming the troubled waters with the sweet words, "Peace, be still." And as quickly as the storm had risen, it dies away. The crew grew weary, the waves sank to rest as if exhausted by their own beating; the clouds broke above their heads; the stars shone; the little boat was at the hearts of the men in it at rest, save for counter-reproof in the Master's words.

To the believer in a Divine Providence, to one who acknowledges the immanence of Almighty God, trouble is a test of belief, sorrow the touchstone of faith. As by struggle we advance, so through adversity we believe. The untried faith is like the untamed virtue. It is a possibility rather than a reality. When things go well, it is easy enough to believe. The care-free naturally trust as they usually hope. It is not difficult to believe when no strain is thereby involved. When things go wrong belief is harder.

When we are in trouble, when we suffer, when our endeavors fail, our undertakings are fruitless, our hopes vain; when we lie wrestling with anguish, when pain wrings the brow and grips the heart; when some one we love very much is in trouble; when some great disaster has caught us on the edge of its whirlpool and dragged us down; when a church or parish, or municipality, or nation mourns a leader or prophet; when some terrible calamity strikes that which tore the riveted steel of the great bridge over the St. Lawrence at which I looked in awe and admiration a few weeks since; when some wide cataclysm of nature overwhelms a great city by the sea, making widows and fatherless, Racs bereft, old men childless, striking down the young and strong, the good and true; when some terrible devastation bursts from the hidden fires that burn beneath us and turns a smiling island into a desert and a charnel house; when something that seems to us unmerited, uncalled for, needless, useless, or arbitrary, happens in the world, when the rain falls upon the just and the unjust alike, faith trembles and we lift voices to heaven and say, "Master, Master, carest thou not that we perish?"

Our Moments of Weakness

Then cynic and skeptic look on us and mock us; they cry aloud, saying, "For he is a God. Either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey peradventure he sleepeth and must be awakened."

Perfect faith is as rare as perfect love. There has been vouchsafed to humanity but one complete sample of either quality, and the world rose in wrath and crucified the Demonstrator of the possibility.

We are all vacillating creatures. Fortune in "shift and change of mood" finds us ever ready to respond to her variant appeals. We laugh, we cry, we are weak, we are strong, we stubbornly resist, and then—we lightly yield. Truly, as Shakespeare says, men are "to one thing constant never." The greatest have their moments of weakness. My study, with some original research, in our American history has convinced me that no man entirely a hero save by the reticence of his biographer. Nor do I mean by this to belittle achievement, or endeavor. Men are great in spite of their weaknesses, not because of them.

In distress the first thing that wavers is faith. It may be that the trouble which brings us low is the result of our own imprudence. "We have done things which we ought not to have done, or left undone things which we ought to have done"—in the solemn language of the general confession which we recite blithely every morning, and the consequences are the natural, perhaps the inevitable results of our sin of omission or commission. In homely phrase Providence is said to watch over children and fools.

A Day in the Steerage of an Ocean Liner

MUCH has been written of the distressing conditions of travel in the third class passenger service. While the western trip is usually most uncomfortably crowded, still one may have a very pleasant passage east.

On the first night of a recent trip the writer found an exceedingly inebriated individual occupying the lower berth. He was anxious that he should know him and was insisting upon the aid of the supposed cheering cup of good fellowship. Another lower berth proved to contain the man necessary for the occasion and the prompt eviction of the bibulous passenger followed. Among other roommates was a youth from a prominent university of vacation. He had athletic ambitions and had entered some of the various competitions abroad.

A little girl of twelve proved to be the belle of the steerage and of the cabin as well. The latter showed her appreciation in a liberal money contribution to reward her singing and reciting. The daily routine is broken by dancing, games, vocalism and not a little eating by those fortunate enough to be good sailors.

The emigrant, while carrying the usual bundle or valise containing his goods and chattels, frequently possesses a considerable amount in cash. Many who have sold home and household do not hesitate to take the cheaper method of travel. Perhaps nothing speaks so eloquently of the resources and youth of our country as this constant inuring of humanity, distributing itself and making room always for more. Each succeeding year adds to the traveling accommodations, and increases the conveniences of the foreign traveler. We are brought nearer to England by a day, or we are offered new steamers at a lower rate than a hotel. One of the newest liners recently carried in the steerage a number of young members of the Y. M. C. A. who availed themselves of the low rates, and who were traveling to study the condition of the foreign laborer.

A big liner to-day runs on almost railroad schedule. On a disabled vessel being sighted, another and smaller steamer is signaled by the big liner to go to its assistance, while the ocean leviathan resumes its race against time. J. B. G.

Last year the total immigration to the United States from other countries was 1,285,349, being nearly 200,000 in excess of the year preceding. It is probable that the present year will show a slight falling off from last year's figures. This is due largely to the "hard times" from which we are just emerging and which have lasted since October, 1907.

For several years past our heaviest immigration has been from Austria-Hungary, which sent us 265,000 in 1906 and 338,000 in 1907; Italy, 273,000 in 1906, and 285,000 in 1907, and Russia, 215,000 in 1906, and 258,000 in 1907. It seems likely that the same order of contributory importance will be preserved this year, the three countries mentioned sending sixty per cent. of our total immigration to all American ports.

Bills have been introduced into both houses of Congress providing for an immigrant educational test, a certificate of character, the limitation of the number of immigrants from any one country to fifty thousand within any period of twelve months, the inspection of aliens at the ports of departure, an increase of head-tax to $20, the exclusion of aliens of poor physique and those who do not possess thirty dollars, and other requirements aimed to discourage undesirable immigration.

Perhaps the consequences of our failures to be or not to be, are warded off. God is long-suffering. He gives us all many chances. We trifle with life and destiny, and perhaps with a certain degree of immunity for a certain period, but by and by there comes a time when the trifle must assume his responsibilities; when "he who has danced, must pay the fiddler." Then our belief, our faith, our hope all take ready for flight.

Man is a creature of interrogations. I blame none for the word "Why?" There is a mother who has gone through the pain and anguish of childbirth. There lies by her side upon the pillow a tiny little figure. It has eyes which do not see, lips which make no sound, hands that cannot grasp, a heart that does not beat. Everything but life is there. Useless all the weary suffering, the long pain, the keen anguish. Why was it? What purpose was served by the tragedy of a thousand homes?

There is a young man or woman just budding into life, so carefully trained, so wisely guided, so usually prepared, and stopped in mid-career, with all the possibilities of the future unopened and unavailing. Why this awful waste of life and love and toil?

Here is a great man or woman, a centre of effort and endeavor in some chosen field of work, to whom their fellows look for counsel, aid, inspiration, help, example, a thousand things. A touch and they are gone and no one can take their place.

This is the state of man; to-day he puts forth
The tender leaves of hope; to-morrow blossoms,
And bears his blushing honors thick upon him;
The third day comes a frost, a killing frost;
And when he thinks, good easy man, full surely
His greatness is a-ripening, nips his root,
And then he falls, as I do.

"Thou fool," is writ before every man, "this night shall thy soul be required of thee." And when his hour strikes, he reads that doom sentence and wonders, "Why?" The widows of the St. Lawrence gaze over the twisted wreckage of that bridge, wonder sadly and question bitterly. The homeless men and women who sat upon the hills about San Francisco and looked down into the seething holocaust in which the labor of years and the hopes of lives went up in flame and smoke, wondered why. The survivors of the sometime smiling, happy people of Martinique did the same thing as they gazed on the smoke hill and the ash-swept valleys. The whole world questioned when the telegraph flashed the news that the President of the United States had been shot. From thousands of lips in these, and every other catastrophe, day by day the cry goes up, "Master, carest thou not that we perish?"

The faith which demands entire enlightenment is not faith at all. It is education. The virtue which survives no temptation is not virtue at all. It is weakness. There can be no answer to the great interrogation. There is no answer to a thousand questions which man puts, which perhaps it was intended that he should put. What we know, we master. It would be a sorry day for mankind if he mastered his God. If he could solve the mystery divine, he might make his own god, as some of us do, out of stick or stone and turn to it in his last hour with the frightful results that I have seen.

The endeavor of life is to believe; the highest function of life is to trust; the end of life is to hope. The question in the text is not an absolute negation. There is no denial of God in it. Men who throw that great interrogation into the face of God do not curse him and die as a rule, although I know some who have done so under such circumstances, but they have faith enough to appeal to the very power they believe to be indifferent. Not to Baal and Ashtaroth, not to any false god of wind or wave, or other land, did the disciples turn, but to the Jesus who was with them, asleep in the stern of the ship.

God is very loving and pitiful. Yes, even though in our sorrow we cannot realize it. He knows how we are tortured and wrung; he knows "the grief that whispers the o'erfraught heart and bids it break" sometimes into lamentations and reproaches. Perhaps to us he seems to sleep as the human Jesus did. The living Christ above us never sleeps. He seems to be silent when things go awry. But he tolerates the question and sooner or later he answers it. It may be that he does not answer it here.

There are certainly things we shall never know, problems insoluble, the problem of trouble, of pain, of wickedness. There are many answers to these, none adequate and satisfactory. Some things we must see "through a glass darkly," but same day we shall see them "face to face," our eyes shall be opened and we shall understand.

Meanwhile, the admonition is that we must have faith. Though he slay us, we must trust him. His is the larger view; his is the deeper thought; his is the grander plan, and not the least part of its grandeur is that it comprehends the infinitely little being we call man.

"Oh," said a woman in trouble, "if I could only be sure that God cares!"

"Madam," was the answer, "that God does care is the very essence of the religion of Christ."

Confidence and trust and hope—these are easy when our ways lie through pleasant paths, but confidence and trust and hope are mere empty words unless they can be bestowed and felt and entertained when, though God is in his heaven, all seems wrong with the world. For this is the gracious promise of the past, no less vital when it was uttered than it is to-day: "Thou shalt keep them in the secret of thy presence from the strife of tongues."

When winds are raging o'er the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
'Tis said far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigneth evermore.

Far, far beneath, the noise of tempests dieth,
And silver waves glide ever peacefully,
And no rude storm, how fierce soe'er it fieth,
Disturbs the Sabbath of that deeper sea.

So to the soul that knows thy love, O Purest!
There is a temple sacred evermore,
And all the babble of life's angry voices
Dies in hushed stillness at its peaceful door.

Far, far away the noise of passion dieth,
And loving thoughts rise ever peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fierce soe'er it fieth,
Disturbs that deeper rest, O Lord, in thee.

A SUNDAY IN WITTENBERG

By MORTON H. PEMBERTON

Luther a Professor in Wittenberg

Luther's Monument in Wittenberg

IT was evening time, and the sun was going down; the chimes of the church bells and the almost noiseless tread of the few passers-by were all that disturbed the solemn stillness of the hour. I felt that I was walking upon holy ground, as I walked in the same rooms and upon the same streets where the feet of Luther and his beloved friend Melanchthon had touched. Who would not feel a thrill of reverence and calm delight in the presence of so many things which told of Luther and the terrible times in which he lived?

Martin Luther

Although Wittenberg is an old, old town, the spirit of progress is still with her, and many nice buildings register 1898 and later. But the old town and the old streets, its historical buildings and churches, remain as in the days goneby, and no hand will tear them away as long as the is engraved upon the memory of human hearts. Instead of the little town of 3,000 inhabitants as in Luther's day, Wittenberg is now a thriving city of about 17,000. The little winding river Elbe weaves its way around one side of the town, and the smooth but slightly undulating land gives it an ideal setting. Shady groves and beautiful walks are on every side; but a visitor does not care to linger long among trees and waters and nature's charms in Wittenberg, for during almost every moment of the walk, the place seems to be whispering the name of Luther.

As it was not yet time for services at the churches, we went first to the old Augustine Monastery, where Luther lived from 1508, when he was called as a professor in the University at Wittenberg. Luther's rooms are now used as a museum, and are filled with interesting relics of the great reformer. In his study-room the old writing-table where Luther worked stands defiant of time, though its splinters and rough edges are beginning to tell the story of its early day. The large iron stove that warmed Luther's blood can yet hold the flames of many fires; the same window-panes, with a broken one here and there, still let in the sunlight; the same planks remain in the floor of his study. On a shelf near by is Luther's old drinking goblet, and I thought how often that old cup must have quenched the thirst and refreshed the parched lips of Luther, when he returned from hours of lecturing and preaching; for it must be remembered that Luther preached more than once a week, and that his sermon was more than twenty minutes long.

Besides Luther's lectures in the University, he often preached once or twice a day in the church for days in succession. The original pulpit from the town church, where Luther preached, and the old sand clock, have been brought to the museum, and are exhibited together. There are also, in his study, the double chairs, where Luther is said to have spent so many moments with his beloved wife, Catherine Von Bora. Mrs. Luther lived in a day when women stayed at home. In a glass case is some needlework, done by the hands of Mrs. Luther. In the museum at Leipsic is a very fine picture of Luther, his wife and his five children. It is a nice little family group, Luther sitting at the table, in these plain rooms, with a musical instrument in his hands; his wife sitting on the other side of the table, and the children standing near by, with their eyes upon the father and mother. In other rooms are a number of modern paintings of historical events in Reformation times, such as "Charles V. at the Grave of Luther," "The Diet of Worms," "The Translation of the Bible," "Luther's Betrothal" and "Luther Fixing his Theses on the Door of the Church." Luther's library, together with a large number of famous editions of books of the Reformation period, makes a very interesting collection. In a glass case are preserved Luther's early translations of the Bible in his own handwriting. We saw Luther's engagement ring; for, according to German custom, the man wears a ring as well as the woman. But I think that every man has to buy his own ring.

Just a few doors from Luther's house is the old home of Philip Melanchthon. When I saw the old bed I couldn't help thinking of the time when Luther knelt down by its side, and begged his faithful Melanchthon not to die, because he could not spare him. Luther did not know that the weak body of his gentle friend, Melanchthon, was going to rally and last longer than his own vigorous and powerful frame. Out in the back yard, under a large tree, is an old rock table, bearing the name Melanchthon, which was inscribed by himself under date 1551. Here, upon this crumbling rock desk, under the shade of this tree, Luther and Melanchthon worked at the translation of the Bible.

A few feet from Melanchthon's house stands the old Wittenberg University, now used as barracks for soldiers. This university, by reason of its famous professors, was in Luther's day one of the first in Germany. In 1817 it was incorporated with the University of Halle, which is now regarded as one of the first in Germany and perhaps the best for students of theology.

As the church bells were now ringing, we went to the church where Luther nailed his theses. Here stands a great, massive building of stone, with two high, round towers, more like a cathedral than a church. The outside bears the marks of time, but the inside is of most costly and elaborate finish. In 1892, the interior was restored, and that time the Emperor of Germany and many representatives of royalty were present at its celebration. There are nine colossal statues of reformers by famous sculptors—Luther and Melanchthon occupying the chief places—also twenty-two medallions of friends and protectors of the Reformation. The altar has a figure of Christ in the centre. It was a privilege to stand in this beautiful church, with the sunlight streaming through the richly-stained windows, and behold the wonderful transformation that has taken place in this historical building. The wooden doors, to which Luther nailed his ninety-five theses, were burned in 1760, during the war with Austria, but in 1858 Emperor Frederick William IV. replaced them by double iron doors, bearing the original text of the theses. One could easily imagine the defiant Luther standing before the doors, and nailing to its panels those immortal words, which were to be read not only by those who passed by, but by the whole Christian world. A short distance from the church is the spot where Luther burned the Pope's bull. It is at the edge of the town, under a great massive oak tree, which still lives to tell the story of the brave deed done under its branches near 400 years ago.

An iron fence surrounds the old tree, and upon its trunk, in metal, is the German inscription: "Dr. Martin Luther verbrannte an dieser Staete am 10 December, 1520 die Papstliche Bannbulle." In this day of religious liberty and human freedom, it would be no extraordinary deed to burn a Pope's bull of excommunication and to nail propositions denying his infallibility to church doors; but when we think of Luther's day, when such acts meant social disgrace, physical torture, and even death, we cannot be too grateful to the heroic Luther who struck the first successful blow for religious freedom. It had been but a short time since the brave John Huss had been burned at the stake for similar declarations, and friends were urging Luther to forego his vigorous and defiant opposition; but Luther listened to nothing save the divine voice of truth within him.

How often did Luther, during the hardship and dangers of his frequent journeys, look back with longing to the towers and walls of the much-loved town of his student days! It was from Wittenberg that he went to the famous Diet of Worms, where every effort was made to have him recant. Put under the ban he was hastening back to Wittenberg when his cart was suddenly surrounded by a party of armed men with visors lowered. The knights quickly bore him off to the castle of the Wartburg. On the way Luther found that they were friends, who had captured him to prevent his falling into an ambush of his foes. Secreted by the friendly Elector of Saxony in the Wartburg, the "Knight of St. George," as they called Luther, translated the Bible into the German tongue.

Well may the people of Wittenberg preserve the earthly relics of the sainted reformer and cherish his memory in their hearts; for the world never had a better, braver, nobler friend than Martin Luther—the greatest German of them all.

Luther Captured by his Friends

NEW YORK'S GREAT TENT CAMPAIGN

DURING the present season, the New York Evangelistic Committee has established eleven tent centres, eleven open-air centres, and meetings in thirteen shops and factories. "It is a privilege to take the Gospel message to those who do not receive it in any other way," said Superintendent Arthur J. Smith. "The responsibility for reaching these non-church-goers rests with us. I sometimes think Jesus is waiting to see how much faith we have. Men are brought to Christ as individuals; let us get pastors and laymen in personal touch with our converts."

In accordance with this idea, a new plan has been followed this summer, by which pastors of churches have been brought in closer touch with the people, conducting the meetings during the first weeks and supplementing the labors of the evangelists throughout the season. Each section of the city where a tent is located has organized a district committee composed of local pastors and laymen from the neighboring churches. All the home and city mission boards have been represented on the executive committee. The Christian Endeavor Societies, Epworth Leagues, and other Young People's organizations have been actively associated with the work.

During the past few weeks, rallies of various kinds have been the conspicuous feature. At noon several open-air meetings have been held at different points in one section of the city, and after twenty minutes or so all the companies assembled would march to one central spot and unite in a great mass meeting. In the evenings, the Young People's Societies would follow the same plan, holding several street meetings and then marching to the tent for a general rally.

No department of the work has been more important than the shop meetings, held for men or women at piano factories, tool shops, paint shops, car factories, printing establishments and pattern factories.

The crowds who have welcomed the Rev. William Wilkinson each summer have followed him from the old Custom House now demolished, to the new Custom House in Bowling Green, although services are still held by Dr. Wilkinson and Dr. Lyman-Wheaton daily on Wall Street. The Rev. J. C. Ludgate came from Chicago to resume his work of last year at Abingdon Square. Here he found many converts of past seasons who testify that their lives have been changed since they surrendered to Christ under the stars in the open street in the noisy city square.

Efforts to reach the great foreign element of this metropolis have been made through out-door meetings at Fort George, where Hebrews, Italians, French, and Germans congregate on Saturdays and Sundays by the thousand. On one Sunday afternoon special preachers speaking in the various languages addressed those of their own tongue. Street meetings have been held for Italians, Spanish-speaking people, and for colored people. Besides two open-air meetings for Italians tents have been set up at three places, one in connection with the Presbyterian Italian Mission, another co-operating with the Methodist Episcopal Italian Church in Little Italy, and a third in the Bronx, where the Rev. Robert Walker, for thirty years a missionary under the Baptist Board in Italy, has been "preaching double," as he calls it; that is, speaking first in Italian and then in English.

A tent for German-speaking people and one for Swedes and Finns have been crowded nightly. The most pleasing of these services have been those held for children. Five or six hundred boys and girls fairly overflowed the Swedish tent every night, until the committee substituted a larger tent. Work among children generally is the most encouraging everywhere. Italians, Germans, Swedes, Irish, Americans, and many little Hebrews press with determination into the tents, eager to learn the Bible lessons and Gospel hymns. As an auxiliary to the tent work, various Circles of King's Daughters have been formed for the women and older girls. Four "Neighborhood Circles" have been organized. These circles assist materially in following up the tent work by personal visitation during the winter.

The Rev. F. E. Smiley of Colorado has earned for himself this summer a new title, "The Bishop of the Docks." In addition to his work in the tent, where he preaches to audiences such as are seldom seen elsewhere, he goes to the docks and steamers on Sunday afternoons and talks to dock-hands, sailors, officers—any who come his way. The Rev. H. D. Sheldon, who has been stationed at another of the "hard places," says: "The Gospel is what these people want. In our efforts to take it to them, God is signally blessing us."

The season's campaign will close with a series of rallies continuing from September 11 to 13, including the usual Wall Street noon rally in Trinity Church, a children's rally, to be held probably in Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church, an open-air evening rally in Union Square and one on Sunday afternoon at Fort George, and the so-called Converts' Rally in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. R. E. Mitchell, a singer and director of recognized ability and wide reputation, has acted as director of music for the summer campaign. In addition to organizing and training the large chorus that sang at the opening rally in the Metropolitan Opera House and the seven district rallies, Mr. Mitchell has had personal charge of the music in one of the tents. Associated with him have been such well known musicians and singers as E. A. Wayne, cornetist and leader; Lewis M. Armstrong, soloist and instructor; Benjamin Franklin Butts, soloist; W. Philip Hanson, and Miss Grace D. Hildebrand, widely known as "the Gospel Nightingale." At the closing rally on the 14th of September in Carnegie Hall, all the choirs from the various districts will combine and form a chorus of 500 voices.

IN "SHUSHAN THE PALACE"

were painted red, and the beams of the roof were carved brought from the mountains of Lebanon. Each of the slender stone columns supporting them was surmounted with bulls facing in opposite directions.

The modern Persians, who are noted for their beautiful tiling and carpets, have inherited the art of their manufacture from their ancestors. Near the summit of the outer wall of the pylons on a background of pale blue is a beautiful procession of lions in relief; on the outer walls of the main hall is still more beautiful relief, representing the body guard of the Persian kings. Here upon the warriors we see the long sleeved white and yellow tunics, the green twisted turbans, the laced boots, the ear rings and bracelets, which formed the dress of Esther's day. Here, too, are the bows and lances which were the weapons of the soldiers. The coloring of the tiling is as bright as on the day when Queen Esther feasted there with the king.

Though few of the decorations of the palace have survived, the imagination may easily picture the stately magnificence of the furnishings, the draperies, the rugs, the gold and silver vessels of diverse shapes and the rich costumes in which the revelers were clad. At the rear of the hall beneath the crimson canopy was the golden throne of Ahasuerus.

Before it were the carpets upon which the king's feet alone might tread, and among the cup-bearers who stood behind the king to keep his golden bowl filled with wine was the Biblical Nehemiah.

So renowned were the drinking banquets of the Persian kings that the early Greek writers have described them. Of the Persian royal assemblies, Herodotus says that the nobles are "accustomed to debate upon the most important matters when they are drunk, and whatever they approve in their debate is proposed to them on the next day when they are sober, and if they still approve the matter when they are sober, they finally decide upon it. If they first consult upon any matter when they are sober, they discuss it again when they are drunk."

Another Greek writer says: "Generally the king breakfasts and sups alone, but sometimes his wife and some of his sons sup with him, and the ladies of the harem sing and play the harp during the meal."

Thus the book of Esther, the modern excavator and the ancient writers agree in painting the picture of life of long ago in Shushan the Palace. Of all the Biblical books, none describes more faithfully the customs of the ancient Orient, none bears a plainer stamp of truth. Again during the past few years the French have been excavating among the ruins of Shushan the Palace, and it is hoped that still more light may be thrown upon the days of Queen Esther in the distant land of Persia.

Found Health at Mont-Lawn

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I want to thank you for sending thirty-six of our children to Nyack. They had such a good time and looked so well. They had all been ill during the winter and needed the change very much. Last week I went up myself to visit the Home, was most hospitably received and was shown all over. I think it is one of the most beautifully arranged places I have seen and so much is done for the children's comfort and happiness!

A Moral Education Congress

THIS month will witness the assembling in London of the first International Moral Education Congress. Twelve countries are to be represented, including our own, and among the speakers announced are many of the leading educators of Europe and America. The general theme will be the importance of moral instruction, a subject now almost wholly neglected in our educational systems.

This new movement is full of promise for the students of the next generation, who will reap the benefit of what may be accomplished. It will probably result in imparting a new and powerful stimulus to educational reforms of the most vital character. It may become the foundation of an international moral propaganda for the training of the young in honor, patriotism, friendship, courtesy, temperance, kindness, and purity—essential qualities that make for good citizenship, and which are not now taught in our schools as they should be. Speakers of ability will discuss the importance of Bible study and the general relation of religion to moral education. Many religions will be represented, but the Congress, we are informed, will restrict itself to a general survey of educational problems from a moral point of view, "leaving untouched the questions of home education and religious and philosophical education." What the attitude of the Congress will be toward the Bible, as the best of all moral standards, cannot be gathered from the programme, the working out of which will be watched with interest.

The Lesson of Springfield

THE recent riots at Springfield, Ill., have shown to what a pitch the passions of men, once let loose, may be excited, and how citizens, ordinarily conservative and orderly, may be momentarily swept away in a tumult of lawlessness and disorder. But race riots and lynchings are not monopolized by any section of our country. Such scenes, unfortunately, can be duplicated in almost any city, North or South, under similar conditions. We are quick to point the finger of accusation at a city or State where they happen, and to cry out against their lawlessness. When they do happen, it is undeniable that they make an ugly stain on our boasted civilization. We are made painfully conscious of the fact that beneath the veneer on the surface there still lurks, in all of us, a good deal of the old savage. Without the restraining influence of Christianity, which presses home upon us the sense of the obligations due to society, we would be but poor citizens.

The Sincerity of Tolstoi

IT IS undeniable that, as was the case with Wagner, the dramatic instinct is strong in Tolstoi; but it does not seem possible that one can read his voluminous works in their entirety without receiving an impression of their utter sincerity. His judgment may properly be impugned, but the verdict of the vast majority of the thoughtful observers of the world, who for thirty years have been watching him closely, is that he is an honest man. His benevolences have been vast, and there is no doubt that, but for his wife, he would have sacrificed all of his fortune to his peasants. He is the faithful and beloved adviser of hundreds of them. He is a patriot, and his hold upon the affections of his countrymen is so strong that not even the most arrogant despotism that the modern world has ever seen has dared to lay hands on him.

No, the salvation of Tolstoi has been his greatness. Even his most trifling compositions are touched with it. His spoken words are charged with it. The whole conduct of his estate is on a great and noble scale. The spirit of the man, his insight, his outlook, is great. He rises above his contemporaries as the Eiffel tower overtops Paris. Especially have his vast philanthropies, not so much of money as of his time and thought and love, endeared him to the world and commanded its homage. The new Russia, for which millions are praying, will, when it comes—and it will come—owe much of its light and its freedom to the aged man just now celebrating his eightieth birthday. But, taking into account his environment, the strange Slav ideals among which he was reared and educated, and the barbarous customs which have surrounded him, the estimate of the Christian world must place him among the great figures of the ages.

A Gospel to Rich and Poor

IN THE death of the Rev. Donald Sage Mackay, the metropolitan pulpit loses one of its strongest, ablest and soundest preachers. Dr. Mackay was a firm believer in the power of the Gospel to transform human character and make life worth living. He dealt sturdy blows at corruption in high places, and was unsparing in his denunciation of every species of dishonest method in business. In social, as in spiritual work, he had wonderful prescience. Men of wealth who controlled large enterprises, he held, should recognize that they are only stewards, and this stewardship, he declared, "fully recognized and practised, is what alone will save the country from the destructive forces of anarchy and communism." Rich and poor, he believed, should meet together on the plane of common brotherhood, and he gave this a striking exemplification when he invited the converts of the Bowery Mission to come and fill his platform and tell his rich parishioners how, even outside of the church, divine grace had sought them out and redeemed them. The whole Christian Church in America is a loser by the early death of this able, broad-minded preacher, who gave promise of greatness with maturer years.

The Joy of Mont-Lawn

AFTER a visit to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Mr. R. W. Watchorn, United States Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, wrote to the editor of this paper:

"I have often had occasion to suppress the proverbial 'lump in the throat' on account of the happenings incident to my peculiar office; but they are caused by the mingled incidents of joy and sorrow. Mont-Lawn raises only the throat lump of joy. It was a great day—a foretaste of heaven, a vestibule to Paradise. May your shadow never diminish."

Joy and Sorrow—how closely they are linked together! In life, the sorrows far outnumber the joys. This is especially true of these children of the tenements, whose little lives have in them more of shadow than sunshine. The joys of Mont-Lawn are to them far beyond their imaginings, and are all the sweeter by contrast with their everyday surroundings and experience.

It has been a great summer for Mont-Lawn. Many guests have written us expressing delight over their visit to the Children's Paradise, where joy makes all forget for a time the cares and troubles of the great big world outside its gates.

DISTINGUISHED AUSTRALIANS WHO GAVE OFFICIAL WELCOME TO OUR WHITE FLEET

American Fleet in Australia

OF ALL the ovations given the American fleet none has been more royal than the one in Australia. At Sydney, N. S. W., the ships were received in a magnificent manner. Public functions of every conceivable kind were participated in by officers of state, of army and navy, by the nobility and the common people. Receptions, dinners, concerts, gymnastic exercises, reviews, and other entertainments followed in quick succession, each trying to outdo the other. The climax was reached at the Centennial Park, where the biggest review of naval and military forces in the history of Australia was witnessed by three hundred thousand people. With the Governor General of the Commonwealth were the State Governor, Rear Admiral Sperry, the British Admiral, representative Australian statesmen and a brilliant assemblage of women. Upward of 12,000 troops participated, including 2,500 Americans, 600 Royal naval marines, 6,000 Commonwealth army and navy militia and 3,000 cadets. The Americans were accorded a tremendous ovation and their appearance was the subject of general admiration. The government declining to furnish free transportation to the military students of the public schools, a large number of them marched afoot eighty miles to take part in the parade.

Just before the departure of the fleet the school children of Sydney bade a beautiful farewell. Eight thousand of them, in colored garb, paraded the streets, and when the domain was reached spread it into a marching figure representing the American and Australian flags, in living colors, with the legend "Hail Columbia" surmounting the whole. The drill and evolutions were perfectly done, and the thousands lining the streets and filling the grand and broke into a frenzy of applause.

As the little ones wheeled into the flag formation they burst out singing "Advance, Australia," followed by "The Star Spangled Banner." During the latter song, as though in reply to the query, "Does that Star Spangled Banner still wave," eight thousand flags fluttered on the breeze from the marching mass amid a roar of applause that completely drowned the song of the children. It was the most impressive sight that has greeted the American officers and men in all the spectacles prepared for them since they left Hampton Roads. Amidst the songs of children and the cheers of men and women the fleet sailed away for Melbourne, where Lord Northcote, Governor-General of Australia, Admiral Sir Henry Rawson and his aides, and governors of various States and the multitude will accord to our Americans the princely welcome which is in store for them.

When the fleet started on its long journey one fear after another was expressed. They were all in vain. The trip has been good for the ships; it has improved and seasoned the men; it has excited a just national pride; but, best of all, it has been the instrument of good fellowship and international co-operation in the advancement of the race.

Thou that dwellest at the entry of the sea, which art the merchant of the people unto many isles, hast said, I am perfect in beauty. All the ships of the sea with the mariners were in thee. (Ezek. 27 : 3, 9, R.V.)

Average Length of Life

Cassell's Saturday Journal has an article containing some significant facts about the average of human life. Among other things, it says:

"The man who lives till he is more than a century old and the child who dies in infancy are alike included in the law of averages. They balance each other's chances, as it were.

"Of 100,000 people living at the age of 10, only

95,614 will live to the age of 21, only 82,284 will be living at 40, only 49 will be living at 96, and only nine at 97. At 30, the average man may take it that he has under 35 years to live; at 40, under 28 years; at 50, under 21 years; at 60, under 14 years.

"In each and all of these cases, how he lives will determine whether he will have a longer life or a shorter life, but the average will infallibly work out within a space of ninety years."

These facts ought to prompt the most serious meditation. It is not well to go about the duties of practical life with an hour-glass in the hand looking at death and the grave, when the duties of life are to be performed with a joyous and hopeful spirit, but the fact that so many years are mathematically measured out to the average person ought to remind us of the brevity of life, the certainty of death and the reality of the issues of the great future, and to inspire us to greater diligence in the discharge of present duties.

So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. (Psa. 90: 12.)

Refused a Tip

Because Honos Muller, a waiter at a pavilion in East Eighty-fourth Street, overlooking the East River, refused to take a tip, Walking Delegate M. J. Murphy, of the Waiters' Union, threatens to call a strike of all the other waiters there, unless Muller is immediately discharged. It seems that the waiter had refused a tip of one dollar from a man who was paying for a ten-dollar dinner. Murphy entered the restaurant and said: "I am walking delegate of the Waiters' Union. I want to see Honos Muller at once." Muller was called. "What do you mean by not taking the tip?" queried Murphy. Muller explained that he did not need the money and was paid by the Pavilion Company for his services and that he was opposed to the system of tips. Murphy replied: "Don't you know you will break up the waiters' business and take bread from the mouths of children? If you are not discharged at once, I shall call a strike of every waiter in this place." It is a great question whether the whole practice of tipping is not a mistake and fault. Men in all callings ought to be paid a fair amount for their service and they should not be left to practise upon the sympathies or forage upon the purses of the public. It is said that porters in cars, waiters in hotels and restaurants, barbers in the shops and men in various callings of life are paid a mere pittance with the understanding that they are to get the rest of their wages out of the tips of the public. But the idea of calling a strike on all of the waiters in a restaurant because one did not need or believe in the system of tips is the limit of insolence and folly. Men who have means ought to be generous with those who are not so well off, but the impositions of mendicancy, however respectable, are as demoralizing to the one receiving as to those giving. It is only a question of a fair equivalent for services rendered.

For as much money as it is worth he shall give it me. (Gen. 23: 9.)

Governor Hughes to Young Men

The cornerstone of a splendid Young Men's Christian Association building was laid at Plattsburg, N. Y., August 13. Loyal L. Smith of New York gave $125,000 toward the structure, and the citizens generally contributed $30,000 more. Governor Hughes made the principal address. Among other things he said:

This ceremony celebrates an important step in the furtherance of an enterprise which cannot fail to be of the greatest benefit to the people of this favored city.

Your young men will have as buttresses those early ideas which they have received from father and from mother. However careless a man may be in his own case with regard to the doing of this or that, when he comes to tell his boy, every man wants his boy to see things as they are.

Here the young man will have a place in which the teaching of his parents will continue. Here he will be taught that the boy who is honest, the boy whose word is as good as any man's bond, the boy who will not lie, who loves truth as his own life, who will carry into any activities an honest intent to do his best, will ever be conscious, whether he has won or lost, of having played a man's role in this world. I have no confidence in conventions which deal only with formal rules of conduct, for he must see the whole game; then he will know what is worth while, willing to take his chance, willing to do his work, so that his proudest boast will be to have men say: "He's all right!"

It is a fortunate thing for the young of our land that men of the moral fibre of the Governor of New York are upon the stage to act and give words of advice. A statesman of incorruptible integrity has an unspeakable influence upon the young people of the period, and those having the laying of the cornerstone in charge made no mistake in asking Governor Hughes to make the address in which he emphasized the value of parental training and the necessity of its perpetuation in the institutions of our time.

And thou, Solomon my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart and with a willing mind. (I. Chron. 28 : 9.)

Civilization in Natal

The present Governor of Natal is Sir Matthew Nathan, a Jew by race but a Christian by profession. He has of late spent a month going through Zululand, and has visited mission stations, making addresses in them encouraging the people to habits of industry, and urging them to follow the instructions of the missionaries. At one of these stations he said:

"I have often heard it discussed among white men whether it is well that the black man should be taught the white man's religion; whether he can ever be made to follow its practice and understand its beauties. After meeting the Christian natives in many parts of Africa, I have no doubt myself that, however disappointing at times may be the effect of Christian teaching, it must in the end do good. It is good that pretended witchcraft, with all the crimes that come with it, should be done away with. It is good that the principle, which is followed by the whole white world, of one man having only one wife should be followed by the black. It is good that by using his hands to work, his head to think, and his heart to feel, the native should put away the life of sloth and sensuality which are obstacles to his rising to that higher life which should be the aim of every man; that life in which happiness is derived, not from what a man gets or attains for himself, but from giving happiness to others. You of the Mission have examples in your midst, in the revered chiefs and in your teachers, of this higher life, and these examples should lead you to be good men and women, and to that happiness and contentment which come from leading healthy, laborious, and noble Christian lives. . . . The road to civilization is long, and the way you have traveled on it is as yet but short; but every step on that road is a gain, and if you hold firmly by each gain, and remember and act up to what you have been taught by your teachers, this country will in time become civilized."

The Governor of Natal has indicated the true secret of the best civilization of any nation, which is the practical employment of the principles of the religion of Jesus Christ. Africa, in natural resources, is rich beyond all computation. What an unspeakable contribution to the world will be made when Africa shall have been civilized and Christianized!

The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as a rose. (Isa. 35 : 1.)

THE GROWING UNREST IN INDIA

WHO are the foes of Hindustan? Not the alien race which has given peace to the land; not the tribes beyond her frontiers, nor any fleet that sails the seas; but her enemies are those of her own household. Spurious patriots fan the natural aspirations of a dependent people, and sow a harvest of calumny and lies that they themselves may reap reward.

India presents a medley of castes and races in various stages of civilization. Less than seven per cent. of the entire population is able to read and write. The people generally may be stamped as absolutely loyal. They regard the British Raj as the only possible government for India, and the only abiding guarantee of continuous peace and justice. Far from desiring the doubtful boon of a "representative government," and the general application of the elective principle in Indian politics, fully 99 per cent. of the population have no interest whatever in such a movement; whilst the vast bulk of the people would not even understand the meaning of the term.

By a process of elimination, we realize that even the genuine reformers of India, together with the more seriously disaffected, form but a small minority. These reformers may be broadly divided under two heads: (1) those who seek in politics alone a panacea for everything; (2) those who strive primarily to bring about social and economic reforms to ameliorate the condition of the masses in such wise as legislation alone could never effect. The latter are the true friends of India, to whom patriotism is not an idle word. Their work is in the main, unostentatious, few seeking either fame or public recognition.

The purely political reformers, on the other hand, are unfortunate in having attracted the least desirable element in any community — disappointed place-seekers, shady pleaders, unscrupulous journalists, vindictive jail-birds and impetuous youths. These juvenile allies form the fighting front of the extremist party. By means of an unbridled press, the Indian youth is openly incited to follow the paths of anarchy and bloodshed. The result of such systematic teaching was seen recently, when two English ladies were killed at Muzaffarpore by misguided youths. The wirepullers remain ever in the background, and though disseminating the pernicious teachings of Western anarchism, yet lack the courage that is oft displayed by the European anarchist.

In the West, even anarchism has never stooped so low as to seek its instruments solely in the ranks of schoolboys. Organized resistance to the forces of law and order is preached and applauded, and the minds of irresponsible striplings have become inflamed in this campaign of undisguised sedition and lawlessness. Bengali youth has gloried in the notoriety it has attracted, and vainly believes that humanity is staggered at this demonstration of Bengali "heroism." During the time of the Calcutta riots in November last, the following effusion, written in all seriousness, appeared in an Anglo-vernacular journal: "Twenty lathi-armed students beat a solitary policeman! Oh, what a people! Raj-put, Sikh and Pathan stand aghast at Bengali valor!" This reads like irony, but the reflection will serve as a keynote to the Bengali character.

The so-called unrest of India originated in Bengal, and took more definite form after the inspiring victories of Japan over her powerful antagonist; whilst the reform of the Indian universities and the partition of Bengal, during the vice-royalty of Lord Curzon, lent plausible excuse for more truculent agitation. Emissaries were sent from Bengal to different parts of India, trying to fan the sparks of revolution; but beyond the wordy support of certain Maratha malcontents and creating an ebullition amongst a few students in Southern India, the efforts of these peripatetic anarchists have met with no appreciable success.

The recent outrages are condemned and deplored by the leading native journals, and by every Indian of repute. In an issue of the Jam-e-Jamshed, one of dian youths in New York were being shadowed and intimidated by detectives from Scotland Yard! fairness to American intelligence one can only surmise that the press gave currency to this absurd rumor in a spirit of amusement rather than belief. Cuttings from the papers containing these stories have been mailed broadcast to every likely subscriber to a martyr's cause. It is a well-conceived plan for securing sympathy and — money. Indian philanthropists and reformers, who may perchance receive these remarks, will be well-advised to make the rough and independent investigations before rendering a single pice to any of their compatriots in America. This is written advisedly by a lover of India, and one who has the true welfare of India at heart.

If a referendum were taken in India, it is doubtful whether ten thousand adults out of a population of 300,000,000 would vote for the abolition of British rule. There is no other alternative which the ordinary citizen would entertain for a moment. With all its faults and blunders, India has enjoyed under British rule an almost unbroken period of peace, progress and good government. Never before had the whole of India recognized the sovereignty of a single ruler. Its former history is one long record of rapine, bloodshed and internecine war.

Few people realize that at the present day one-third of the country still remains under the authority of hereditary native princes. The total population of these feudatory States almost equals that of the United States; and yet one hears nothing of these political aspirations from any of the native principalities. The Indian nobility are loyal to the core, and carry their subjects with them in implicit allegiance to the British Raj. Government of majority — the dream of the extremist reformers — is an exotic, which even in Europe is of comparatively modern growth. But such a form of government is contrary to the spirit of Indian life and traditions, and on the grounds of expediency and self-interest would encounter vigorous opposition from all sections of the community. Mussulmans, as a body, would be opposed to it, for an elective government would place them at the mercy of the better educated Hindus. The Jains and Parsis, who are the most enlightened communities in India, would likewise oppose it, for they would be altogether outvoted. As the native gives clear evidence of statesmanlike qualifications (and mere education is surely not the chief of these) he is allowed to share more fully in the responsibilities of government. This is one of the most serious problems confronting the British Raj. It will be seen, therefore, that all the clamor which emanates from Bengal is in no sense an index to Indian needs and aspirations. At the best it represents but a shadowy chimera; at the worst it assumes the slogan of patriotism whilst inciting to acts of crime. The causes which make the Bengali youth, in particular, such fertile soil for the growth of anarchy and lawlessness, can only be lightly touched on here. They are (1) a naturally excitable temperament, (2) habitual indiscipline, the best and sanest vernacular papers in India, an earnest patriotic appeal is made, and leaders of political movements are called upon to strengthen the hands of government in eradicating the forces of crime. Any measures taken by the Indian government to put down the anarchist conspiracy and bridle a seditious press will have the support of educated Indians generally. Even in Poona — that quondam hotbed of disaffection — the leading members of the bar have dissociated themselves from the anarchist propaganda of the Bengali "patriots."

It cannot be too clearly understood in America (to which country a few of these discountenanced agitators have been drawn) that virtually every statement of theirs issuing from press or platform is either deliberately false or wildly imaginative. In America, as in India, natives of standing and respectability give these agitators a wide berth. It will not be beside the truth to observe that at the present moment any self-styled "patriot" touring this country, and publicly animadverting against the British rule in India, is more or less of an impostor trying by false representations and an air of martyrdom, to raise funds for his own ends. Quite recently, some of the New York papers printed, with scare headlines, an absurd canard to the effect that a few In-

THE GROWING UNREST IN INDIA

(1) lack of interest in manly sports and wholesome amusements, (4) laxity of paternal control, (5) atheistic tendencies fostered by a purely secular education with its smattering of advanced Western thought, (6) the circulation of seditious and pornographic books, (7) flagrant and inconceivable immorality, which has no equal in any university city in the world.

The average boy matriculates at the age of sixteen, and has completed his university course at an age when in Europe and America most men are only commencing their college career. The education they receive is far from ideal; but at the passing of a university examination is the stepping-stone to a government appointment, and incidentally increases his value in the marriage market, as a Calcutta B.A., or even the ridiculed "tailed F.A." can command a larger dot than the man who lacks these embellishments, it is obvious that a university education is the ambition of every native youth. That the British Raj cannot possibly find appointments in the civil service for all who deem themselves qualified is a fertile source of discontent.

Reared amidst such an environment, is it any surprise that the product is what it is? The time-honored relationship of child and parent, chela and guru, are rapidly becoming a memory of the past. In so far as the legislature can check this downward trend it is its duty to do so fearlessly. A few reforms suggest themselves: Efforts should be made to secure a higher stamp of teacher by offering better remuneration than at present. Headmasters should be encouraged to repress gross disorders, and their hands should be strengthened in every way. Inspectors, both English and native, should receive careful training in their work before being deputed to tasks requiring special knowledge and experience. The number of educational inspectors should be increased, that their work may be thorough and effective. Discipline should be enforced at all costs, and schoolboys forbidden to take part in political demonstrations.

Whilst the Department of Public Instruction and the university authorities are scrupulously careful in their selection and approval of text-books and library books, and so insure the healthy character of every page, government should co-operate more fully by stamping out the production and circulation of pernicious and salacious publications. Degenerate native publishers and journalists must be taught the difference betwixt license and liberty, vice and morality. Let the administration of India develop on constitutional lines, allowing, by all means, perfect freedom of discussion both on the platform and in the press. Legislation should insure that a mere puppet may not be put forward as "editor" or "proprietor" when punishment is to be meted out, whilst the real offenders remain secure in the background. Furthermore, the privilege of the postoffice should be denied all convicted conspirators, as well as all writers, printers and distributors of seditious and demoralizing literature. To be blacklisted by the postoffice, if the order were properly enforced and evasion rendered a misdemeanor, would have a more salutary effect and would be a greater deterrent than a mere term of imprisonment. Measures like these would have the hearty support of every Indian publicist of standing.

I have seen it stated by Indian agitators in this country, and reproduced in the American press, that in the matter of civil appointments in India Englishmen have all the plums, and the native must be content with the minor offices, ranging from $120 to $1,500 a year. What are the facts? Nearly all the civil judges and magistrates in courts of original jurisdiction are natives of India. The salary of a High Court Judge, whether English or native, is $16,000 a year. In America the Chief Justice receives only $13,500. In other departments of State the native of India is equally well provided for. At the last census, only 864 Englishmen held active civil appointments under the government of India, as against 3,752 natives. Since 1879, the number of natives in the public service has been increasing steadily, whilst the British element has been decreasing. Many desirable posts are reserved exclusively for natives. In the civil courts throughout India, with the exception of the Courts of Appeal, native judges alone are found, and hold jurisdiction in all cases affecting Europeans as well as natives. And well they perform their duties. Their standard of morality is very high, and "graft" amongst the judiciary is unknown.

Space will not permit me to discuss the vast social and economic questions, which concern the individual more acutely than the dreams of political visionaries. The stagnation of Indian women (not one in 300 of whom can read or write); the lot of the females generally; the dawning emancipation of the virgin widows; the greed and persecutions of the "Bunnia" and the "Marwari" — the money-lenders from whose yoke few rayots are free; the scarcity of skilled and unskilled labor—strange as this fact may seem in a country of teeming millions; the apathy of the cultivators in the matter of education (only 25.3 per cent. of the boys of a school-going age attend school at all, whilst the percentage of the girls is only 3.4 per cent.); the deterioration of many native arts and handicrafts, and the conservatism of the native and his consequent indifference to modern industrial improvements — these are vital problems whose very enumeration is pregnant with interest and concern.

A PARSEE

A CHIEF OF KAKAL

FIGHTING SIN ON THE ISTHMUS

FROM personal knowledge of most of the sections on the Isthmus, as also of other countries, I am not sure that the Isthmus is morally worse than other places. Neither do I believe it is better. I know of no better field for Christian work or those who have a heart to do it.

On the Zone there are from 40,000 to 50,000 men employed by the Commission. Including Colon and Panama, there are possibly something over 100,000 on the Isthmus. A large number are Roman Catholics and are ministered to by their priests. There are twelve Protestant ministers, and all are doing their best to lead their fellow men to a better life.

We should recognize Christian workers wherever found, and not ignore them. It has been stated that at Culebra "the Christian mission is the only life-saving station." I may say that there are in that very place two substantial church buildings. In the largest, services are regularly and frequently conducted by various ministers. The other is in the centre of the largest colored population, and every service is well attended, and frequent additions are made to the church. The minister is colored and generally respected.

At Gorgona, there are two Protestant churches and one Catholic. The two Protestant pastors regularly minister to their people. Open-air services are occasionally held there, as in other places.

The impression has been given that very little, anything, is being done for the moral and spiritual welfare of the community. If girls are shipped from the States to Colon for immoral purposes; if some are stolen and others ensnared by false advertisements for stenographers, school teachers, etc.; surely if such wicked work was carried on to any extent, the public would know it, and the authorities also. If the Commission knew of its existence, immediate action would be taken to end the horrid traffic. I know there are bad practices on the Zone—bad enough; but similar conduct can be duplicated elsewhere.

Besides the ministers referred to, a number of men and women are actively engaged in Christian work, ministering to white and colored, believing the Gospel is for all. At nearly every section on the Zone, the Gospel is preached. The Wesleyan Methodists have two ministers, with local preachers in many sections. The Episcopalians have four ministers and several stations. The Baptists have four ministers, and several stations. The Seventh-day Adventists work in Colon. The Salvation Army has two men from the States, with many helpers. The Y. M. C. A. have several centres with nine splendid secretaries.

Gambling and drunkenness exist on the Zone; but if men keep at this business and it is known, the Commission soon makes them conspicuous by their absence. We aim and hope to see drink entirely cut out on the Zone.

What distresses us as much as anything is the unconcern about the best of things, even by those who were regular attendants at church services in the homeland. The god of pleasure is eagerly sought after. Sunday baseball has multitudes of attendants. Arrangements should be made for the employees to have Saturday afternoon for relaxation and innocent games.

We are not pessimists. We are hopeful as to the future. Our trust is in the living God. We believe the Word is what it purports to be—mighty through God—and that it has not lost its native power. It does pull down; it does build up. So we continue at our posts. We ask Christians, especially of the United States, to labor fervently with us in prayer.

Among the Workers

—STEPS ARE now being taken to incorporate the Williamsburg and Brownsville (New York) Missions to the Jews, founded several years ago by Rev. Leopold Cohen. These missions have been remarkably successful, and the property to be turned over by the founder to the new corporation is valued at $75,000, all of which he will dedicate wholly to the work of the united missions.

—AT THE meetings of the Seamen's Christian Association, New York, during the past twelve months there was an aggregate attendance of 98,560 sailors; ships visited, 1,890; services held at mission, 313; temperance pledges, 474; reading matter, including tracts, 31,212. The Society is now in its twenty-first year. It is wholly unsectarian. Its headquarters are at 399 West Street, New York.

—DR. YUNG, former Chinese Minister of Education, and a noted progressive, in an interview published in the New York Herald, pays this tribute to the missionaries in China: "I know many serious charges have been made at times against some Americans, notably the missionaries, but no one familiar with the work the American missionaries have done in China will do other than praise them. They have done more to educate and uplift the people than any other class. In all my travels in China, along the coast and inland, I have never failed to see improvement and higher standards where the American missionary has been at work. Mr. Taft, I believe, holds the same view as I do as to the work of the missionary."

DAVID, THE ANOINTED KING*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

HOW nature and all its kingdoms teach obedience to law! Everything follows the law of its being steadily, except the human race. Man continually tries to break law, but he cannot really break it, though it often breaks him. In violating God's laws, he collides with the universe to his own overthrow. How Saul was finally brought down from his high estate by harboring the hidden, and perhaps at first the little sin of covetousness is illustrated by the following incident from natural history: Some shepherds once saw an eagle soar out from a rock. It flew majestically up into the sky, but, by and by, it became unsteady in its motions, and began to waver in its flight. At length one wing dropped, then the other. The poor bird struggled vainly for a moment, and then fell swiftly to the ground. The shepherds sought the fallen bird, and found that a little serpent had fastened itself upon it while it rested on the crag. The eagle did not know that the serpent was there. But the reptile wound its lithe body around the wings of the eagle, and gradually tightened its grip while the proud monarch was sweeping through the air, and the eagle came reeling down in the dust. It is a picture but a higher appeal could have been made in showing her the light and comfort and hope which that amount of money would bring to people in darkness and distress. Covetousness unchecked takes no account of these things, nor of any of the things of God, and brings the soul into living apart from God. It is thus we separate ourselves from God.

What a contrast there must have been in the appearance of Saul as on the day of his coronation he stood higher than any man in Israel, and so regal in form that all the people shouted: "God save the king!" and on those other days when his form was crouched under the curse resting upon him.

There were three anointings for David. First in his father's house in Bethlehem. No one was more surprised than the father himself, and his brothers, by their looks, showed their disdain; but Samuel, the prophet of God, had no doubt about it, for God had said: "Arise, anoint him; this is he."

David's second anointing was at Hebron when the tribe of Judah proclaimed him king. This anointing was as plainly by the direction of God as the first had been, for God had told him to go "unto Hebron."

The third anointing of David also took place at Hebron when all Israel came to crown him king.

Why did they come? Because moved by an impulse from God, which led them to declare: "We are thy bone and thy flesh." David was "a man after God's own heart," but we can not say therefore that he was a man without faults. Some one has said: "The current in David's life was right, but there were eddies of wrong; while in Saul's life the current was wrong, and the eddies were right." It should comfort us greatly to know that God recognizes the good that is in us, although we are not perfect. Individuals have not always this charity for each other.

Here is a saying:

There's so much good in the worst of us,
And so much bad in the best of us,
That it best becomes the best of us
To praise the best in the worst of us,
And ill becomes the worst of us
To mock at the faults in the best of us.
Then let the best and worst of us
Extol the good in the both of us.

So far as we have studied the life of David in his quarter's lessons, we have seen only the good traits of his character: humility as a shepherd boy; bravery and trustfulness in God in time of danger; loving kindness toward a friend, and praise for a dead enemy, until it has been said of David: "Suppose we had for the first time opened the book at the chapter II. Samuel 1, containing David's lament, what would have been our impression? Reading the lament, without knowing the history which preceded it, we should undoubtedly have said, 'David has lost in Saul the tenderest of his friends and the wisest of his counselors; his heart has been impoverished; the light which he viewed from heaven has suddenly been put out.'"

But we shall have no fault to find with David for this, when we remember that the one greater than David has said: "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." It has been said of David: "A rare ambition was in him of all that was gentle, tender, and mild, with the most exalted enthusiasm, the most noble aspirations, the most generous sentiments, the most manly deportment, the most heroic daring, and the most invincible prowess joined to invariable consideration of others, open-heartedness, humbleness, and entire absence of all pretension."

We can hardly think of David apart from his harp, and the songs which he wrote are the psalms which for ages have been in the hearts and on the lips of Christians. It has been said that in these psalms "all enemies, all distresses, all persecutions, all sins are seen in the light of God. It is to him that the cry goes up; it is to him that the heart is laid bare; it is to him that the thanksgiving is uttered. This it is that makes them so true, so precious, so universal." And so the sweet psalmist of the Israelitish race is the sweet psalmist of the whole world.

These Six Silver Butter-Spreaders Free

They are marked Wm. Rogers & Son AA. This means their famous Extra Plate, with a base of highest grade of Nickel Silver.

The design is new and original, known as the Armour Lily Pattern.

You will find individual spreaders in the best jewelry stores, and the price will be $3, or more for the six.

They are worth it. One can't find a design, even in solid silver, more chastely artistic. And better plate is obtainable.

Here is a way to get them:

We want you to use a little Armour's Extract of Beef—just enough to know it. We don't want to give you a jar—that would cheapen it. It is good enough to buy, and we ask you to buy it.

But we are going to give you, for a little time, a present worth more than you pay. That is the individual butter-spreader—the most popular silver table article sold in the stores today.

Our offer is this: Send us the metal cap from the jar that you buy. Or send us the paper certificate under the cap.

Send with it ten cents to pay cost of carriage and packing. We will then send you one of these butter-spreaders.

You will want a whole set when you see it. So we are going to supply you enough for your table—all on the same terms.

Send us one cap or certificate for each spreader you want. Send them any time—just as you buy the Extract. Send with each cap the carriage and packing cost—ten cents—and we will send you one spreader for each.

Our usual limit is six to a family, but we will send up to twelve if you need them.

That means you can get $3 worth of standard silver for 60 cents, simply by proving, for you good and ours, the merits of

Armour's Extract of Beef

The spreaders, of course, have no advertisement on them. They bear only the name of Rogers, the maker, as you find them in jewelry stores.

One object is this: There are numerous extracts of beef on the market not nearly so good as ours.

Perhaps they cost a little less. You may buy them on that account. But, even with the best of them, you are obliged to use four times as much as you do of Armour's.

We want you to prove that—in your own home. Prove that one jar of Armour's Extract of Beef goes as far as four jars of other kinds.

Then judge for yourself if you want an extract four times as good as the common.

Another object is this: American cooks have not yet learned the hundred uses of Armour's Extract of Beef. German cooks use fifty times as much.

The making of beef tea is one of the least of its uses. Any meat dish that needs more flavor calls for extract of beef.

You need it in gravies—in soups—to reinforce sauces. You need it to utilize left-overs. It makes left-overs appetizing and gives them a savor. You can save in this way a vast amount of waste.

There are directions with every jar. Please follow them. You'll wonder how you ever got along without its daily use.

This is why we offer these individual butter-spreaders. We are willing to give back more than you spend—for a little time—to show you what Armour's Extract of Beef means to you. Then you will use it forever, and use it in a hundred ways.

Please order one jar—now before you forget it. Then send the cap with ten cents to Armour & Company, Chicago, Dept. AB.

Sold by grocers and druggists everywhere.

The First Anointing of David of Saul's fall. The serpent of covetousness took hold of Saul when he beheld the fatlings and the lambs, and all that was good among the spoils which he had taken from the Amalekites, but was commanded of God to destroy. And when he took the king of the Amalekites prisoner, the serpent of covetousness got a tighter grip upon him, and presently he had fallen so low that lying seemed to him the only way to get out of it. Down still further he came, when Samuel delivered the message from God: "The Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel." A man who could not himself obey was not the man to teach others obedience.

Saul begged hard that the doom might be averted; he resisted even to the tearing of Samuel's garments; but with no avail. In a way Saul was king unto the day of his death when he took his own life upon Mount Gilboa. But he was king only in form, like the eagle brought to the ground.

The eyes of a lady fell one day upon a magnificent ring, and she coveted it. The price of the ring was one thousand dollars. Her husband consented to the purchase, but he took an interesting way to educate his wife concerning the great price of the ring. He instructed his banker to send her the price of the ring in small pieces—pennies, dimes, quarters. In came the money, bagful after bagful. When the money was piled up before her, it alarmed her, as she realized how much a thousand dollars really meant, and she saw that to purchase the ring would be extravagance, and gave up buying it. That was one way to cure covetousness. Perhaps it appealed to her as no other way could have done,

THE FIRST "WHITE RIBBONER"

The Late Mother Stewart, Pioneer Organizer of the W. C. T. U.

THE founders of the Woman's Christian Temperance movement are rapidly passing away. On August 6, in Hillsville, O., one of the most famous and devoted of them, Mrs. Elizabeth M. Stewart, breathed her last, at the advanced age of 92.

Mother Stewart, as she was generally called, was known in her prime as a "Wendell Phillips in petticoats." Her home at that time was in Springfield, O., and near the leading churches of the place. A saloon was opposite one of these, and its door was in plain sight from Mother Stewart's house.

For some time she watched one Sunday a continuous line of men going into this saloon for their morning drink. The State law forbade distilled liquors to be sold by the glass for drinking on the premises, and a city ordinance was supposed to close the doors of all saloons on Sunday.

She grew more and more indignant the longer she gazed. At last, a man carrying a sweet little baby, entered with the rest, and then she could stand no strain no longer. She knew that she might get the saloonkeeper arrested if she could prove his offense, and she determined to attempt it.

Disguising herself by removing her glasses, rearranging her hair and donning an enormous waterproof cloak, she entered the saloon and asked for something to drink.

"What will you have?" inquired the bartender.

"Some—some—sherry wine," she murmured.

He poured it out for her. She paid him, and, taking the glass in her trembling hand, walked out.

Before she had left her home, she had asked her friends there to pray that she might be sustained. When she returned, she assured them that their prayers had been answered. Although her hand had trembled, her heart had been fearless. She described her feeling as that of treading on air.

The following Tuesday evening she spoke in the church opposite the saloon on the subject, "How I Bought My First Glass of Liquor." The audience packed the room, and went wild with enthusiasm. Many were inspired to follow Mother Stewart in her attacks upon the saloon, which from this time became frequent, and which were now first called "Temperance Crusades." These were undoubtedly productive of great good.

Mrs. Stewart established the first Woman's Christian Temperance Union in Ohio at Osborn, in 1873. In 1876, she visited England, and organized the first Woman's Christian Temperance Union in that country.

The facts that the minister of the church could look across while he was preaching and see the men entering the opposite saloon, in defiance of both the State and city laws; and that every man in his congregation knew that such law-breaking was going on, and yet none of them lifted hand or voice to protest, shows how much courage was required for this good woman to burst the bonds of precedent and strike such a blow for the Master. Even those who did not sympathize with the great "White Ribbon" movement which she inaugurated, realized that she was worthy to be ranked among the heroines of our time.

Mrs. Stewart's somewhat remarkable oratorical powers were used not only for the temperance cause. After the Civil War, she lectured throughout the Southern States on behalf of the war sufferers. During the last five years of her life, she resided in Hillsville, but her great work was done in the neighboring city of Springfield, which is incalculably better for her noble and loving efforts.

GERMANY'S DEAD AMBASSADOR

BARON SPECK VON STERNBERG, German Ambassador to the United States, died suddenly in Heidelberg on August 24. He had gone to that city to consult a specialist about a disease of the ear which had troubled him for some time and had lately assumed a violent form. Complications appeared, resulting on August 21 in a well-defined case of inflammation of the lungs. In his weakened condition, the Baron was unable to withstand the attack. The Baroness was with her husband at the end.

Baron von Sternberg was born in 1852. He was educated in Germany, pursuing special studies in international law, political economy, and military and naval science. In 1885, he was military attaché to the German legation in Washington. In 1890, he became secretary of the legation in Berlin, and later served as chargé d'affaires at Belgrade. In 1898 he was first secretary to the legation in Washington, where his courtliness and diplomatic tact won him many friends, President Roosevelt among the number. During the negotiations with Venezuela the Baron was entrusted with a special message from the President to Emperor William, a mission which he accomplished in a way that won the Emperor's warmest approbation. Shortly afterward, he was appointed Ambassador.

The Baroness von Sternberg was before her marriage Miss Lillian May Langham, of Kentucky. She was the recipient of telegrams of condolence from many quarters, including one from Emperor William, which pays a distinguished tribute to the deceased. The Emperor writes: "I lose in him a valuable friend and a distinguished diplomatist, who has rendered important service to me and the Fatherland, and whom it will be most difficult for me to replace."

The Bible was a daily treasure to her and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a welcome weekly visitor. She was greatly interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, and showed it in a practical way, providing for several children each season. The influence of such a life will be long felt, even though its earthly career has closed for the more joyful one beyond.

Do this at once for health's sake. At least make every bedroom absolutely clean and wholly sanitary so that the relaxed body will not be poisoned nor infected during the period of sleep when it is most susceptible to infection.

The solid colored softly tinted Alabastine wall protects the health and is also the most artistic, effective mode of decoration.

Wall-paper is dangerous to health, so are cheap common kalsomines made from whiting, colored and stuck to the wall with animal glues.

The soft velvety tints produced by using Alabastine are most satisfactory for dining rooms, and living rooms as well as bedrooms.

The Alabastine wall does not fade, can be cleaned easily and is always sanitary.

Have an experienced decorator do the work—or, do it yourself. It's easy; just mix with cold water and apply with a flat wall brush.

Well Brewed Postum Always Palatable.

The flavour of Postum, when boiled according to directions, is always the same—mild, distinctive, and palatable. It contains no harmful substance like caffeine, the drug in coffee, and hence may be used with benefit at all times.

"Believing that coffee was the cause of my torpid liver, sick headache and misery in many ways," writes an Ind. lady, "I quit and bought a package of Postum about a year ago.

"My husband and I have been so well pleased that we have continued to drink Postum ever since. We like the taste of Postum better than coffee, as it has always the same pleasant flavour, while coffee changes its taste with about every new combination or blend.

"Since using Postum I have had no more attacks of gall colic, the heaviness has left my chest, and the old, common, every-day headache is a thing unknown." "There's a Reason."

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend.

CHAPTER XXX

THE house-party at Belcourt was not an entire success that Christmas. Even the guests felt a subtle something in the air that was not conducive to ease; while Mrs. Merideth and her brothers were plainly fighting a losing contest against a restlessness that sent a haunting fear to their eyes.

Margaret, though scrupulously careful to show every attention to the guests that courtesy demanded, was strangely quiet, and not at all like the merry, high-spirited girl that most of them knew. Brandon, who was again at the house, sought her out one day, and said low in her ear:

"If it were June and not December, and if we were out in the auto instead of here by the fire, I'm wondering, would I need to—watch out for those brakes?"

The girl winced.

"No, no," she cried; "never! I think I should simply crawl for fear that under the wheels somewhere would be a child, a dog, a chicken, or even a helpless worm—something that moved and that I might hurt. There is already so much—suffering!"

Brandon laughed uneasily and drew back, a puzzled frown on his face. He had not meant that she should take his jest so seriously.

It was on the day after New Year's, when all the guests had gone, that Margaret once more said to her guardian that she wished to speak to him, and on business. Frank Spencer was used to this sort of thing now, and he was resigned to the inevitable; but his eyes were troubled, and his lips were close-shut as he motioned the girl to precede him into the den.

"I thought I ought to tell you," she began, plunging into her subject with an abruptness that betrayed her nervousness, "I thought I ought to tell you at once that I—I cannot go with you when you all go away next week."

"You can not go with us!"

"No. I must stay here."

"Here! Why, Margaret, child, that is impossible!—here in this great house with only the servants?"

"No, no, you don't understand; not here at Belcourt. I shall be down in the town—with Patty."

"Margaret!" The man was too dismayed to say more.

"I know, it seems strange to you, of course," rejoined the girl, hastily, "but you will see—you will understand when I explain. I have thought of it in all its bearings, and it is the only way. I could not go with you and sing and laugh and dance, and all the while remember that my people back here were suffering."

"Your people! Dear child, they are not your people nor my people; they are their own people. They come and go as they like. If not in my mills, they work in some other man's mills. You are not responsible for their welfare. Besides, you have already done more for their comfort and happiness than any human being could expect of you!"

"I know, but you do not understand. It is in a peculiar way that they are my people—not because they are here, but because they are poor and unhappy." Margaret hesitated, and then went on, her eyes turned away from her guardian's face. "I don't know that I can make you understand—as I do. There are people, lots of them, who are generous and kind to the poor. But they are on one side of the line, and the poor are on the other. They merely pass things over the line—they never go themselves. And that is all right. They could not cross the line if they wanted to, perhaps. They would not know how. All their lives they have been surrounded with tender care and luxury; they do not know what it means to be hungry and cold and homeless. They do not know what it means to fight the world alone with only empty hands."

Margaret paused, her eyes still averted; then suddenly she turned and faced the man sitting in silent dismay at the desk.

"Don't you see?" she cried. "I have crossed the line. I crossed it long ago when I was a little girl. I do know what it means to be hungry and cold and homeless. I do know what it means to fight the world with only two small empty hands. In doing for these people I am doing for my own. They are my people."

For a moment there was silence in the little room. To the man at the desk the bottom seemed suddenly to have dropped out of his world. For some time it had been growing on him—the knowledge of how much the presence of this fair-haired, winsome girl meant to him. It came to him now with the staggering force of a blow in the face—and she was going away. To Frank Spencer the days suddenly stretched on ahead in empty uselessness—there seemed to be nothing left worth while.

"But, my dear Margaret," he said at last, unsteadily, "we tried—we all tried to make you forget those terrible days. You were so keenly sensitive—they weighed too heavily on your heart. You—you were morbid, my dear."

"I know," she said. "I understand better now. Every one tried to interest me, to amuse me, to make me forget. I was kept from everything unpleasant, and everybody that suffered. It comes to me very vividly now, how caeful every one was that I should know only happiness."

We wanted you to forget."

But I never did forget—quite. Even when years and years had passed, and I could go everywhere and see all the beautiful things and places I had read about, and when I was with my friends, there was always something, somewhere, behind things. These four years in New York were vague and elusive, as time passed. They seemed like a dream, or like a life that some one else had lived. But I know now; they were not a dream, and they were not a life that some one else lived. They were my life. I lived them myself. Don't you see—

"Margaret's eyes were luminous with feeling. Her lips trembled; but her face shone with a strange exaltation of happiness."

But what—do you mean—to do?" Margaret flushed and leaned forward eagerly.

I am going to do all that I can, and I hope it will be a great deal. I am going down there—to live."

To live—not to live, child!" Yes. Oh, I know now," she went on hurriedly. "I have been among them. Some are wicked and some are thoughtful, but all of them need teaching. I am going to live there among them, to show them the better way."

The man at the desk left his chair abruptly. He walked over to the window and looked out. The moon shone clear and bright in the sky. Down in the valley the countless gleaming windows and the tall black chimneys showed where the mill-workers still toiled—those mill-workers whom the man had almost come to hate; it was because of them that Margaret was going. He turned slowly and walked back to the girl.

"Margaret," he began in a voice that shook a little, "I had not thought to speak of this—at least not now. Perhaps it would be better if I never spoke of it; but I am almost forced to say it now. I can't let you go like this and not—know. I must make one effort to keep you. . . . If you know that there was some one here who loved you—who loved you with the whole strength of his being—and if you knew that to him your going meant everything that was loneliness and grief, would you—could you—stay?"

Margaret started. She would not look in the eyes that were so earnestly seeing hers. It was of Ned, of course, that he was speaking. Of that she was sure. In some way he had discovered Ned's feeling for her, had perhaps even been asked to plead his case with her.

"Did you ever think," began Spencer again, softly, "did you ever think that if you did stay, you might find even here some one to whom you could show—the better way? That even here you might do all these things you long to do, and with some one close by your side to help you?"

Margaret thought of Ned, of his impulsiveness, his light-heartedness, his utter want of sympathy with everything she had been doing the last few weeks; and involuntarily she shuddered. Spencer saw the sensitive quiver and drew back, touched to the quick. Margaret struggled to her feet.

"No, no," she cried, still refusing to meet his eyes. "I—I can not stay. I am sorry, believe me, to give you pain; but I—I can not stay!" And she hurried from the room.

The man dropped back in his chair, his face white.

She does not love me, and no wonder," he moaned bitterly; and he went on word by word what had been said, though even then he did not find syllable or gesture that told him the truth—that she supposed him merely to be playing John Alden to his brother's Miles Standish.

CHAPTER XXXI

THE household at Belcourt did not break up so early as usual that year. A few days were consumed in horrified remonstrances and tearful pleadings on the part of Mrs. Merideth and Ned when Margaret's plans became known. Then several more days were needed for necessary arrangements when the stoical calm of despair brought something like peace to the family.

"It is not so dreadful at all," Margaret had assured them. "I have taken a large house not far from the mills, and I am having it papered and painted and put into very comfortable shape. Patty and her family will live with me, and we are going to open classes in simple little things that will help toward better living."

"But that is regular settlement work," sighed Mrs. Merideth.

"Is it?" smiled Margaret, a little wearily. "Well, perhaps it is. Anyway, I hope that just the presence of one clean beautiful home among them will do some good. I mean to try it at all events."

"But are you going to do nothing but that all the time—just teach those dreadful creatures, and—and live there?"

"Oh, yes," declared Margaret with a bright smile. "I've planned a trip to New York."

"To New York?" Mrs. Merideth sat up suddenly, her face alight. "Oh, that will be fine—lovely! Why didn't you tell us? Poor dear, you'll need a rest all right, I'm thinking, and we'll keep you just as long as we can, too." With lightning rapidity Mrs. Merideth had changed their plans—in her mind. They would go to New York, not Egypt. Egypt had seemed desirable, but if Margaret was going to New York, that altered the case.

"Oh, but I thought you weren't going to New York," laughed Margaret. "Besides—I'm going with Patty."

"With Patty!" If it had not been tragical it would have been comical—Mrs. Merideth's shocked recoil at the girl's words.

"Yes. After we get everything nicely to running—we shall have teachers to help us, you know—Patty and I are going to New York to see if we can't find her sisters, Arabella and Clara-bella."

"What absurd names!" Mrs. Merideth spoke sharply. In reality she had no interest whether they were or were not absurd; but they chanced at the moment to be a convenient scapegoat for her anger and discomfiture.

"Patty doesn't think them absurd," laughed Margaret. "She would tell you that she named them herself out of a 'piece of a book' she found in the ash barrel long ago when they were children. You should hear Patty say it really to appreciate it. She used to preface it by some such remark as: 'Names ain't like measles an' relations, ye know. Ye don't have ter have 'em if ye don't want 'em!' Ye can change 'em. I did. They was Sue an' Sally before!"

"Ugh!" shuddered Mrs. Merideth. "Margaret, how can you—laugh!"

"Why, it's funny, I think," laughed Margaret again, as she turned away.

Pure Milk for Baby

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early '30s. The best systems to-day are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

Try Our Rivals, Too

When somebody says, "Our beans are as good as Van Camp's," please buy them and try them. Serve them with ours—hear what your people say.

Then serve with Van Camp's a dish of home-baked beans. Ask your folks which they want next.

We are willing to leave it to them.

It is easy to say, "As good as Van Camp's." But we spent half a lifetime to get them so good.

That goodness comes, in part, from using Michigan beans. Ours are picked out by hand from the choicest beans grown.

Sometimes they cost us six or seven times what other beans would cost.

Part of the goodness is due to our tomato sauce—made from vine-ripened tomatoes.

We could buy sauce ready-made, from inferior stock, for exactly one fifth what ours costs.

Then we bake in live steam, where you use dry heat.

We bake in small parcels, so all beans are baked alike.

No beans are crisped—no skins are broken. Our beans are nutty because they are whole.

And they are baked in a heat that makes them digestible. Our beans don't ferment and form gas.

The beans, the pork and the tomato sauce are all baked together, securing this delicious blend.

Those are the reasons for that superlative zest—that nuttiness, that mealiness, that you get in Van Camp's.

VanCamp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

Beans are Nature's choicest food—84% nutriment.

If you serve the beans that your people like, they will eat them often—eat them in place of meat.

It means a great deal to get the right beans.

When you let your people decide they will choose Van Camp's always. And you should be glad.

For Van Camp's are always ready—always fresh and savory. No work for you—no waiting.

Please make the comparison now.

This is a healthy city. The sick woman has a relapse. The air of the high mountain is health-giving. A healthy person should be happy. Her husband has a tendency to sickness. My grandparents are healthy people. The professional nurse enjoys good health. The hospital has many patients. The medicines will restore health. My friend is in the sanitarium. In the hospital there is a large collection of medical instruments. The young girl has a tendency toward invalidism. She is the child of a sick woman.

Tribute to Dr. Billy Clark

(Founder of the first Temperance Society in the world in 1808.)

HE SAW the monster raise its head,
And none were found to slay;
He saw it mark the men of might,
And gather in its prey.
Would no one grapple with the foe?
Would no one break its power?
Must the children of woe still suffer so?
The crisis came that hour!

He raised a standard then and there,
And flung it to the breeze.
It was worth a life of toil and care,
With little of wealth or ease.
With seldom a word of hope and cheer,
With sneer on every side—
What could they do, that feeble few,
To stay the fearful tide?

They made their prayer to the God of right,
That lion-hearted band,
Then looked away to the Source of Light,
And followed his guiding hand.
Their beacon-fire shone bright and clear,
And soon an answering ray
Flashed from afar like the morning star
That ushers in the day.

A century has passed since then;
His grave is now a shrine.
From far and near the hosts appear—
They're forming into line.
Their watchword as they face the foe,
Whose deadliest blows are hurled—
"King Alcohol shall be dethroned
And driven from the world!"

Books Received

A Manual of Personal Hygiene. Proper living upon a physiological basis, by American authors, edited by Walter L. Pyle, A.M., M.D.; illustrated. Pp. 451. Price $1.50. W. B. Saunders Co., Philadelphia and London, publishers.

The Congo and Coasts of Africa. A new book of travel and investigation in the Dark Continent, by Richard Harding Davis, F.R.G.S. Mr. Davis went to Africa to investigate the Congo abuses, and the results of his investigation are here told in interesting form, together with many new facts concerning the Congo. Pp. 220. Copiously illustrated from photographs taken by the author. Cloth covers. Price $1.50. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, publishers.

Theodore Roosevelt, the Boy and the Man, by James Morgan. This biography does not profess to be an analysis of individual character, nor is it a campaign book. It is simply a straightforward and up-to-date account of the life of one of the most interesting personalities of our time, and shows Mr. Roosevelt as student, politician, soldier, governor, vice-president, President, sportsman, and the centre of a charming home circle. Pp. 324. Illustrated. Cloth covers. Macmillan Company, New York and London, publishers.

The Story of Sir Lancelot and His Companions, by Howard Pyle. "With this begins the third of those books," writes the author-artist, "which I have set myself to write concerning the history of King Arthur of Britain and those puissant knights who were of his court and of his Round Table." No one has made a closer study of the old Arthurian legends than Mr. Pyle: no one has absorbed more of their chivalric spirit. He writes of the Knights of the Round Table so quaintly and with such a wealth of incident, that the reader feels, as he turns page after page, as if the real present had faded into mist, and the past, with all its glitter of helmet and lance, had come back again. The illustrations by the author are full-paged and are drawn with accuracy as to customs and setting. The pictures alone are worth the price of the book. Cloth. Pp. 340. Price $2.50. Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers, New York City.

MOTHER AND CHILD

Both Fully Nourished on Grape-Nuts.

The value of this famous food is shown in many ways, in addition to what may be expected from its chemical analysis.

Grape-Nuts food is made of whole wheat and barley, is thoroughly baked for hours and contains all the wholesome ingredients in these cereals.

It contains also the phosphate of lime grown in the grains, which Nature uses to build up brain and nerve cells.

Young children require proportionately more of this element because the brain and nervous system of the child grows so rapidly.

A Va. mother found the value of Grape-Nuts in not only building up her own strength, but in nourishing her baby the same time. She writes:

"After my baby came I did not recover health and strength, and the doctor told I could not nurse the baby as I did not have nourishment for her; besides, I was too weak."

"He said I might try a change of diet and see what that would do, and recommended Grape-Nuts food. I bought a pkg. and ate it regularly. A marked change came over both baby and I."

"My baby is now four months old, in good condition, I am nursing her and doing my work and never felt better in my life. There's a reason."

A FAMOUS PASTOR DEAD

TAKEN suddenly ill on board an express train, while en route from New York City for Blue Hills, Me., where he had a summer home, the Rev. Donald Sage Mackay, for ten years pastor of the Collegiate (Dutch Reformed) Church of St. Nicholas, Fifth Avenue, New York, passed away just as the train was pulling into the depot at Portland on the morning of August 27. For some time past he had been in poor health, and it was against the advice of his friends that he undertook the journey to join his family in the country. He was accompanied by Mrs. Mackay and his assistant pastor, Dr. A. Hagerman. After entering the Pullman car, he grew rapidly worse and at the end came at 6 A.M. The immediate cause of his death was pulmonary pneumonia.

Dr. Mackay was born in Glasgow, Scotland, in 1863, his father and grandfather having been well known preachers of the Free Church of Scotland. He was educated at Glasgow University and at New College, Edinburgh, and at twenty-six was called to a Presbyterian Church at Fraserburgh, Scotland, but declined it and came to the United States. His first American pastorate was the Congregational Church at St. Albans, Vt. During his residence in St. Albans he married Miss Helen L. Smith, daughter of J. Gregory Smith, president of the Central Vermont Railroad Company, and became time Governor of Vermont. In 1904 he was called to Newark, N. J., a pastor of the North Reformed Church. There his able preaching began to attract attention outside of his own city. In 1898 he was called to New York to become pastor of St.

The Late Dr. Donald Sage Mackay

Nicholas Church. In 1896 he was elected president of the Centennial Session of the Reformed Church General Synod, which met in his church. As pastor of St. Nicholas his fame steadily grew, and during recent years the church has been unable to accommodate those who came to hear him preach. President Roosevelt, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Sage and Miss Helen Gould were among his hearers whenever they attended church in New York. He was not only a brilliant preacher, broad and liberal-minded in all of his pulpit utterances, yet squarely orthodox on the essentials of the Christian religion, but he was a tireless worker and a most faithful shepherd of his flock. Probably no metropolitan pastor in recent years has preached to greater audiences. It used to be remarked that he "preached to men and not to their money." He was fearless in his exhortation of sin in business and in society, and had a tender heart for the poor and the unfortunate. On one occasion, several years ago, he invited the Bowery Mission's band of workers to conduct a service in his church and probably for the first time in the church's history the rich and fashionable parishioners met and listened to the converts from the East Side, who, though poor in worldly possessions, were rich in grace and in the blessings of the new life. The recital of their experiences gave a new sensation to the wealthy congregation. Dr. Mackay in many other ways sought to bring both classes of society into closer touch and to awaken that love of humanity and that sympathy for those in distress that are inseparable from true Christianity.

HOW DEATH CLAIMED A FAMILY

HAVE been very much impressed with the article in a recent issue by the Rev. Emory J. Haynes on "Purged by Affliction," and as the following incident has come under my personal notice, I will give you the facts:

Twenty-four years ago, I was in charge of a Sunday School about four miles from Windsor, N. S., and the subject of this notice lived there. The deacon and his wife were the parents of thirteen children. Eleven of them died and one went away to the States and was not heard from. The deacon died for nine funeral outfits at one undertaker's establishment in Windsor. These children died at all ages, and at one time three died of diphtheria. One fine young woman—a great help in my work—died of brain fever. Hardly had she passed away when a son, pastor of the Baptist Church at Lompoc, Cal., started for home with his young wife and baby to see his parents, when at Chicago he was taken off the cars and died in a few hours.

A very short time afterward another son, who was finishing his theological studies at Newton Theological Seminary, caught a severe cold. He came home, was seized with consumption and died in a few weeks, and was followed in a short time afterward by the only remaining daughter (married). Thus all the children of this family died except one son. Last of all the deacon passed away, and was followed by his wife in less than a year.

How did these afflictions affect the deacon and his wife while they lived? Did they stay away from Sunday School and from preaching or prayer meetings? Not so; but they would still say that "God had been very good to them." They never complained, but looked forward hopefully to meeting all their children in heaven.

A Boer General's Bible

GENERAL BEYERS, the speaker of the Legislative Assembly of the Transvaal, at a recent meeting produced a well-worn and much-knocked-about copy of the Scriptures which, he said, he had carried with him through the war. In the night time, wrapped in his coat, it had formed his pillow. On one occasion it had saved his life. He was carrying it in his breast pocket during a certain engagement, and two bullets struck its brass edging and glanced off. These shots, otherwise, in all probability, would have entered his heart. The Bible was his mother's gift, and he looked upon it as almost a priceless possession.

JAP-A-LAC

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

A HIGH GRADE VARNISH AND STAIN COMBINED

JAP-A-LAC

is made for the purpose of ECONOMY IN THE HOUSEHOLD. It is a varnish and stain combined; is put up in eighteen different colors and can be used for refinishing everything about the home from cellar to garret.

Any housewife can use it with good results. It produces a hard, lustrous finish, which dries quickly. You can refinish floors, interior woodwork, scuffed and scratched furniture instead of employing some one else to do it, or buying new, thus saving money.

It's a pleasure to use JAP-A-LAC, and the satisfaction of knowing you have accomplished such splendid results at so low a cost will seem like a growing bank account to you.

USEFUL HINTS TO HOUSEKEEPERS

A COAT of natural Jap-a-lac applied over old or new linoleum or oil cloth will double its life, by preserving the original coat of varnish which would otherwise soon be washed or worn off.

WEATHER BEATEN front doors are revived and beautified when coated with Jap-a-lac, and "newness follows the brush." It is best to use the color nearest that of the old finish.

WINDOW and DOOR screens should be coated with Jap-a-lac each fall before storing, it prevents rust; use the Brilliant Black on the wire, and the Mahogany, Oak, Cherry or Walnut on the frames. It gives them new life and they will be ready for immediate use next season.

PORCH FURNITURE should be protected and beautified each fall with Jap-a-lac. It is best to use the color of the old finish but if you wish to change the color, use Red or Green Jap-a-lac.

WICKER FURNITURE coated with Mahogany, Ox-Blood Red, Malachite Green or Gloss White Jap-a-lac, looks better than new.

WATER PIPES, furnace fronts, radiators, hot water tanks and iron fences are preserved and beautified with the use of Jap-a-lac. Use the Gold, Aluminum, Dead Black or Brilliant Black.

PICTURE FRAMES, chandeliers, gas fixtures, lamps, etc., given a coat of Gold, Aluminum or Dead Black Jap-a-lac, are renewed almost beyond belief; the Dead Black produces that beautiful wrought-iron effect.

OLD AUTOMOBILES, carriages, wagons, agricultural implements, etc., Jap-a-laced with either Brilliant Black, Red, Green or Lustrous Blue, look better, and are given new life. The cost is nominal, and the work can be done by an inexperienced person.

JAP-A-LAC is a household necessity, and can be used in a hundred and one ways, from "cellar to garret," and is especially adapted for finishing old or new floors and woodwork. Ask your dealer.

For Sale by Paint, Hardware and Drug Dealers. All sizes from 15c to $2.50.

A WARNING AGAINST THE DEALER WHO TRIES TO SUBSTITUTE.

If your dealer offers you a substitute, say to him: "No, thank you; I want what I asked for. Good bye, 'Trade with the dealer who gives you what you ask for. That's JAP-A-LAC."

Write for beautiful illustrated booklet, and interesting color card. FREE for the asking.

If YOUR dealer does not keep JAP-A-LAC, send us his name and loc., except for mail orders—25c. business card of mailing, and we will send FREE sample, quart-size paint tray to any point in the United States.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Church Workers*

NOT long ago in one of our journals appeared a protest from a correspondent against too much giving. She said that people were giving away who could not afford it. They were therefore wasteful and unthrifty. In many cases, they were simply indulging a passion for giving which might better be curbed.

Most people will agree that this advice is needed by few. Christ and his apostles did not seem to think that it was needed by even so many. Give, give, give, is the burden of their preaching. In the evening give, and in the morning withhold not thy hand. Give and it shall be given unto you. He that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. God loveth a cheerful giver—not one who gives grudgingly or of necessity.

If we have money, we are to give that; if we have eloquence and power of exhortation or teaching, we are to give those. We are not simply to believe and to keep ourselves pure, important as belief and personal goodness may be. We are to prove our faith by constant and arduous works and gifts; and especially are we to give to our church, of our money, our time, our strength.

If we cannot ourselves teach in the Sunday School, we may be able to instruct our children at home, or help other teachers who are preparing their lessons. If we feel that we cannot preside worthily or exhort to edification in our meetings, we can at least prepare ourselves thoroughly and be always present promptly, and we can stimulate and encourage in their efforts the members of our families and our friends. We can visit the sick and afflicted. We can give of our substance to good causes. We can speak a good word in season to him that is weary, or give a cup of cold water to the thirsty. We can do something.

There is a story of a little schoolboy in a Connecticut town who, having become a Christian, longed to do some active good among his school fellows. Accordingly, without consulting any one else, but having prayed over it earnestly, he appointed a prayer-meeting to be held at the schoolhouse at the noon intermission. The schoolmaster and the pupils were alike astonished, but the boy was so sincere and conducted the exercises with such propriety that he was permitted to continue his efforts. Soon parents and other friends began to come in, and the local ministers offered to assist the brave young evangelist. The school term closed, but meetings were appointed elsewhere, so that the series was unbroken. It was a small village, but sixty souls in it were converted to Christ that season.

Oh for more of such single-hearted and burning zeal for the Master!

A poor laboring man gave five dollars regularly every year to a certain mission. He was asked: "How can you afford to give so much?" He replied: "I must do something for Christ. I cannot preach nor pray in public—but I have hands and can work, and a certain amount of my work I give to this mission, as my work for Christ."

This man illustrated further a cardinal doctrine of all work for the Master. It should be thought over—should be steadily and persistently practised, and should be the result not only of impulse, but of deliberate principle and resolve.

Parents are undoubtedly too often neglectful of the duty of teaching their little ones the beauty and the delight of work done for Christ and his church, with the element of self quite eliminated; and yet when once the young have learned the joy of such labor, it becomes the animating principle of their lives.

Christ and the Human Mind*

LOUIS XIV, who, in spite of his egregious faults, was one of the wisest and shrewdest of men, was in the habit of saying, "No man would sin, if he could be fully informed of all the facts in any case."

Well may the great apostle affirm that the Gentiles were "alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them." If all men could fully know the vital facts of Christianity, it seems incredible that they should not choose "the better way."

It is because of his confidence in the transcendent power of knowledge that Mr. Carnegie has been moved to give libraries to the world. Many philanthropists have been discouraged because they could not interest him in their schemes, often excellent.

"They are far more necessary to the world than libraries are," they would say.

"There is nothing which so afflicts the world as its ignorance," the sturdy Scotchman would reply. "I am persuaded that knowledge will right most of our wrongs."

Which is only the Pauline doctrine differently expressed. He, too, saw that a darkened understanding was at the root of sin. If ye heard Christ and were "taught in him," if ye had "learned" him, then ye could not sin. These are appeals to the intellect.

In the same way, Peter, adjuring the church first to faith and virtue, as the paramount essentials, implores it next to seek knowledge. The moral quality of a man must come first in our estimate of him. The next thing is, "How much does the man know? Has he been educated?" His worth to the world is going to depend largely upon that. When a man has a noble Christian character, and can add to it a richly stored and cultivated mind, he can do infinitely more for the Master than an ignorant man, however good, can possibly do.

Thus the great Galileo came to a generation which knew him not. As one far greater than he was buffeted and rejected by an ignorant mob, so the distinguished astronomer was unappreciated and abused. It has been said that "it takes a poet to appreciate a poet."

So a certain amount of learning is required in others before a learned man is truly valued. Pearls may be cast before swine. Unknown thousands of great men have been silent concerning great truths, or they have been slaughtered for proclaiming them, because the minds of men were not yet ready to receive the light.

But the one who has most beautifully expressed the need for intellectual light, and the joys and benefits which go with it, is, as might have been expected, the wisest man that ever lived, Solomon himself. Though he may not have written all the proverbs that bear his name, yet they were undoubtedly written and collected under his influence, and bear the stamp of his approval.

Thus, as the reward of integrity, and "that he may preserve the way of his saints," "wisdom shall enter into thine heart, and knowledge shall be pleasant unto thy soul: discretion shall watch over thee, understanding shall keep thee" (Prov. 2: 7-11).

The high office of the well disciplined mind could hardly be more fittingly described. "Instruction," he says to the young man, "is thy life."

This is the same simile which John employs in his wonderful first chapter: "The Word" is "life." Christ, the light of the world, is also, as John again calls him in Rev. 19: 13, the word of God—the written or spoken appeal to the minds of men, as well as the Spirit, subtly seeking the heart.

Are You Too Thin?

For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:
"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My bust is rounded out and I have gained 28 lbs. it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much better satisfied with yourself and more attractive to your friends.

I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

DAVID'S CAREER REVIEWED

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

OUR lessons for the past quarter take us back to the national rejection of God as their king, when they who had been called to be a people separated to God asked for a king that they might not be separate, but "like the nations," and that their king might judge them, and go out before them, and fight their battles (I. Sam. 8: 19, 20). Again and again God had fought for them, and wrought great deliverances for them when they had cried to him. But his deliverances were always preceded by their repentance, and this was the point at issue. They wanted a deliverance which did not necessitate their consciences being aroused, and their pride humbled. The nations around them fought their own battles; God was not in all their thoughts; they took to themselves the credit of their victories. At the cost of losing God as their protector, as well as their guide, the miserable people took this fatal step. Are we following their example? Do we fight our own battles, and take glory to ourselves? The people had their way. God gave them their own desire, and Saul was chosen king, and became what God had warned them he would be—an exactor and an oppressor.

Then came the sad story of Saul's rejection. The people had suffered much under the king whom they had chosen—the man after their own heart. God was preparing the man "after his own heart," whom he educated, partly in Saul's court, but much more through Saul's persecution, to be a life of continued recognition of, and dependence upon, God. In the school of adversity and of subjection, and of wrongs from man, David learned how to rule aright, and his high ideal was the result of his training.

There is something wonderfully pathetic, as well as wonderfully dignified, in the acknowledgment of David's claim to the throne of Jonathan, who was looked upon as the crown prince of Israel. There was no rivalry, but intense affection, between the two young men; it was the finger of God. He had created this oneness by his own spirit. The two friends had much in common for time and for eternity; they both lived for God, and not for themselves, and the good of God's people was far more to both of them than any personal consideration. Jonathan might otherwise have said, "As the king's son, the right of succession is mine." But the people were God's people, chosen of him, and the throne was his throne, for he had been the ruler of his people; and both David and Jonathan saw God in all things. Thus Jonathan, in spirit, did obeisance to David as the Lord's anointed, despite his own position as crown prince.

David twice had the opportunity to prove whether indeed he fully trusted God to bring him to the throne. Twice Saul was in his power—once in the cave at Engedi, and again in the wilderness of Ziph; it was as though God could test him in this way whether indeed he would take advantage of Saul, and slay him, and so end his weary wanderings; or whether he would trust God to deal with Saul, and make his way to the throne. And in spite of the persuasions of men, David continued trustful towards God, and thoroughly loyal towards Saul, whose subject he was, until the Lord should himself remove him.

Are we aware that Christ, whose kingdom we continually pray may come, is educating, in these days before he comes, a people who shall reign with him? Do we see that the tests which come to us in our daily life and work, are our preparation for future reign? And do we consider that we are heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together (Rom. 8: 17)? We all have tests, more or less difficult, in which we may have strong temptations to act with worldly wisdom. But we are in the world for the very purpose of walking, not according to the course of this world. We are not of the world. We live not unto ourselves, "but unto him which died for us and rose again," and most surely we shall not reign with Christ if we make things easy for ourselves, and do not in all things first seek the glory of God. We need never be guided by policy.

Saul was dead. Jonathan was dead, and two other of his sons, but Ishbosheth remained—a weak man, a mere tool of Abner.

The Peace of God

"Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." JOHN 14: 27.

THE Peace of God! O blessed peace
That fills the heart and calms our fears;
That bids our soul's wild tumult cease
And gives us sunlight through our tears.

The Peace of God! O peace divine
That bids our restless souls be still,
Till through the clouds the light doth shine
And we behold His perfect will.

The Peace of God! O restful peace
Through all life's changing scenes below;
In this we'll rest till life shall cease
And heaven's eternal peace we know.

The Peace of God! The promised peace
So rich, so deep, on us bestow;
Then shall our faith and love increase,
And earth become a heaven below.

Author of Peace! To thee we raise
Our prayer for courage to endure
The ills we meet, till all our days
Find rest in thee, thy peace secure.

A Canadian's Appreciation

I CANNOT express my appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in words. Its fearless advocacy of the truth and its unflinching denunciation of vice in all its forms can not fail to command the love and admiration of all who read it. The cause of God and righteousness has no more redoubtable champion, outside the Bible, in all the world. May it continue to circulate and prosper as never before.

REX ROOFING

REX ROOFING

No Other Roofing is the Same

REX Flintkote Roofing is never sold under any other name, and no roofing sold under another name is the same as REX Flintkote Roofing. If there are other roofings that look like REX, there resemblance is only surface deep. The quality of REX Flintkote Roofing goes all through. Its body is high grade, long-fibre wool felt, heavy, dense and durable; the saturation of water-proofing is slowly worked in until the body is thoroughly impregnated with it—REX saturation will never dry out; the coating is of special rubbery, gummy compounds that unite with the body and the saturation, and present a surface that is absolutely weather-proof, fire-resisting, and that will not crack in cold weather, nor blister, peel, scale or melt in hot weather.

The Boy trademark which appears on every roll of REX Flintkote Roofing, is a guarantee with something back of it. Look for it when buying—take no roll that does not show it. If it isn't there the roofing is not REX, no matter what it may look like.

In REX Flintkote you get a roofing that will give you more kinds of protection than any other, a roofing that will last and a roofing that can be laid easily and cheaply. Furthermore, you get a roofing that is guaranteed by a house of known standing, a house that for 71 years has stood for honest goods and honest dealing—for quality and at a fair price.

WRITE FOR BOOK AND SAMPLES.

The book will tell you all about REX Flintkote Roofing and give photographs of buildings on which it is used, with letters of recommendation from users. The samples will show you what REX Roofing really is and enable you to test its properties. Write to-day.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

A. C. F., Panama, Ia. Please explain I. Sam. 18:10.

Just enters where the soul is estranged from God. Saul's jealousy of David rankled within him and brought on a frenzy of his old mental malady, a species of melancholia or religious mania. He "raved" (the latest commentators hold that this word best expresses the sense of the original, instead of "prophesied"). He abandoned himself wholly to his insane anger, which David's skill as a player "with his hand, day by day" on the harp, failed to soothe. Then came the attempt on David's life. The words "evil spirit from God" are liable to be misinterpreted. They form a very ancient phrase, descriptive of religious mania, and merely denote the condition of Saul's mind.

E. E. H., Selma, Ala. Is it true, as has been asserted, that there are twenty liquor licenses at Ocean Grove?

No, it is not. Director Morgan has made a public statement in refutation of the charge. The Ocean Grove Times also denies it, and shows by the official records at Washington, that only two government licenses are held at the Grove, these being by local druggists for dispensing liquor for medical purposes only.

R. L., Iola, Kan. 1. When did Oliver Cromwell invade Ireland? 2. When did he die?

1. Cromwell landed at Dublin in August 1649 with 10,000 troops. 2. Cromwell died in 1658.

P. B., Shawmont, Philadelphia, Pa. 1. When was coal first discovered or used in Palestine? 2. At what date did King Aretas reign at Damascus?

1. Anthracite coal has been found in Palestine in modern times, but whether it was used by the ancients is not known. It is stated in McClintock and Strong's Theological Encyclopedia that the coal mentioned in the Bible was undoubtedly charcoal. 2. Aretas was the name of several Arabian kings. The one to whom you probably refer was Aretas, the father-in-law of Herod Antipas. Aretas took possession of Damascus a little after A.D. 37.

S. C. C., Auburn, N. Y. 1. When were coats-of-arms first introduced into America? 2. What is the significance of a coat-of-arms?

1. Coats-of-arms and family crests were brought over by some of the first settlers. There were men in the first settlement at Jamestown in 1607, and in the settlement at Plymouth in 1620, who were entitled to coats-of-arms. Other families of gentle blood, who came later, brought their family coats with them. 2. A coat-of-arms is used as the badge or insignia of a certain family. They came into use when gentlemen in battle were in complete armor and there was no way to distinguish them. They adopted various devices which were painted or embroidered on surcoats worn over their breastplates, hence the name coat-of-arms. Kings often granted them for special service, and in Europe the coats are registered and their use regulated by law. The coats were engraved on the family silver, coaches, etc., and various additions made to the original coats to show subordinate branches of a family.

A. A., San Antonio, Tex. 1. When and how was the Liberty Bell cracked? 2. Does it belong to the United States?

The Liberty Bell was cracked while being tolled after the death of Chief Justice John Marshall in 1835. 2. It is now in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, and belongs to the city.

W. P. L., Pittsfield, Mass. 1. How long did Saul reign? 2. How long did it take to build the Chinese wall?

1. Saul was king of Israel from about 1093 B.C., to about 1037 B.C. 2. The Chinese wall was built about 211 B.C., but the length of time it was under construction is not exactly known.

E. A. S., Hershey, Neb. 1. Please explain the verse in Job 3:17. 2. Also Revelation 22:2. What is meant by the fruit that was yielded monthly?

1. The wicked means those in whom sin has become a habit or fixed condition and who are at enmity with the righteous. The original meaning was those who are ever restless and full of desires (see Isa. 57:20, 21). The weary means those whose strength has become exhausted either by continued bodily affliction or by the vexations caused by the ungodly (see Rev. 14:13). 2. It means that there was such abundance, and the conditions were so favorable, that instead of yielding fruit according to our earthly seasons, there was endless variety, and each month had its appropriate fruit.

Old Subscriber, Greenville, S. C. Do you think that we will know our friends and loved ones when we meet them in heaven?

See I. Cor. 13:12; Eph. 3:14, 15; Gal. 6:10; Matt. 17:3; II. Sam. 12:23, and other passages bearing on the subject. Heavenly recognition is a belief that has been held in all ages of the world. The Scripture in many places teach that identity will be preserved, and Christ himself in the story of Dives and Lazarus makes it the especial point of the parable. Also, Matt. 25:34 to 46. What would it avail to sit down in heaven with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, if we did not know them? All the redeemed will know each other. Only the ties of love and grace, however, will endure there, for flesh and blood cannot inherit heaven.

J. B., Dubuque, Ia. What is the programme of the Reform party in Turkey?

The Young-Turk party originated in 1893. The seen "among some papers of an old member of that church, perhaps affiliated with it in 1832—some autographs of its old pastors, and the enclosed from our beloved President, Abraham Lincoln, facsimile, I think. I found it among old civil war papers:

"GENTLEMEN: In response to your address, allow me to attest the accuracy of its historical statements; indorse the sentiments it expresses; and thank you, in the Nation's name, for the sure promise it gives. Nobly sustained as the Government has been by all the churches, I would write nothing which might, in the least, appear invidious against any. Yet, without this, it may fairly be said that the Methodist Episcopal Church, not less devoted than the best, is, by its greater numbers, the most important of all. It is no fault in others that the Methodist Church sends more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals, and more prayers to heaven than any. God bless the Methodist Church—bless all the churches—and blessed be God, who, in this our great trial, giveth us the churches."

"May 18, 1864.

A. LINCOLN."

The letter has a historical value, and is of special interest as showing the reverent attitude of the President toward all Christian churches.

H. A., Omaha, Neb. What is the 'ball flower'?

It is not a flower, but a decoration in architecture much used in buildings of the middle ages, and yet used by some decorators. It represents a ball surrounded by the petals of a scutellaria flower.

Old Subscriber, Greenfield, Mass. What are the four largest libraries in this country—that is, which have the largest number of volumes?

The Library of Congress at Washington, the library system of New York, the Boston Public Library, and the library of Harvard University.

D. D., Geneva, Fla. Please explain why Saul in I. Sam. 16 seems to have been acquainted with David, and in chap. 17 asks who he is and whose son?

It does not appear from the Scripture account that Saul knew David at that time, but it is not improbable, in view of the language of Samuel in I. Sam. 15:28, that the prophet may have had intimation of the approaching change in rulership. When he saw the sons of Jesse, however, he evidently knew nothing as to the one to be chosen, for he was guided in his selection wholly by the divine instructions. See chap. 16, verses 7 to 13. David's talents as a player and singer had already become well known, and this would readily account for his being chosen to play for the melancholic king, as related in ch. 16:17-23.

"RETURNING to the Fold," by Davis, is a delightful pastoral scene, showing the familiar flock of sheep with the shepherd and faithful dogs, yet so wonderfully is the subject handled in this instance that it is lifted far out of the ordinary and is indeed one of those pictures that the more we see the more we love.

"Wild Roses," by Morgan, is an altogether charming presentation of nature and child life; three sturdy children tripping home through a meadow, while the smallest tot, whose chubby legs have grown weary with the journey, is joyfully content to be lifted up on big sister's shoulders. It is hard to describe this picture, yet there is something about it that never fails to hold both heart and eye of even the sternest critic.

"Eva," by Edward Cabane, makes an instantaneous appeal. It shows a truly adorable child of seven or eight years, seated in a chair, with dark wistful eyes gazing out from under a mass of curly hair—a picture that is, in short, one of those rare works of art that "satisfies."

These photogravures, all mounted and ready for framing, measure 10x15 inches, and could not be purchased at any art store for less than $1.50 for the set. The exquisite tone-values—that are only made possible by the costly photogravure process—the rare beauty of the subjects which we have chosen, the soft richness and velvet texture of these reproductions, make every one of the pictures worthy to be framed and hung in any parlor or library.

TRAINING THE FUTURE KING OF KOREA

AS THE clouds clear away from the scene of the recent terrible conflict in the Orient, more interest than ever centres about that apple of discord, the strange little kingdom of Korea. There seems to be something singularly helpless and humble about this small empire. Japan has, as it were, put Korea into her pocket, and the silent, white-robed natives seem unable even to complain of the high-handed despotism under which they are now living.

Indeed, according to the Japanese side of the story, there is little to complain of. The old Emperor of Korea is, it is true, kept a close prisoner, though nominally free; but he is said to be a master of diplomatic and political intrigue, and the Japanese may have found it absolutely necessary to restrict his operations. He lives in a cage in one of the palace yards, differentially attended by Japanese guards, and presents, says a correspondent of the New York Herald, "a pathetic picture of fallen greatness."

His worst trial is that he has been deprived of his property. He is an avaricious old man, and supposed himself to be worth nearly a million of dollars in cash, and much more than that in land. This is now kindly held in trust for him and his family by their loving friends, the Japanese.

Nominally, his son by the wife known as Queen Min (murdered some months ago) is the Emperor of Korea. He lives with his poor little child-wife in a palace a few miles away from his father, and he, too, is unable to move or speak, except under keen and watchful Japanese eyes. Marquis Ito and his aids manage the government, and the so-called Emperor is a mere figurehead.

Many think that he is virtually an idiot. His countenance has not a particle of expression, and he submits without any demur to everything which Japan demands of him; but the Koreans say that he is not so foolish. He looks, and that when "the hour of redemption" strikes, if it ever does, will not be found wanting.

The main interest of the empire is concentrated not upon this young man, but upon the little Crown Prince, now eleven years old, who is being taught in Tokyo, so that when he comes to the throne, he can administer the government in true Japanese style.

This manly and lovable child is the son of Lady Om, who lives not far from the old Emperor in Seoul. She is suspected of having hidden away a comfortable fortune, though it is said that she paid vast sums, and told State secrets, in order that her boy should be proclaimed Crown Prince and heir apparent.

Prince Ito himself personally directs the child's education and loves him like a son. In this significant fact lies the prospect of a bright future for the hermit kingdom; for in personal friendships like this lurk noble possibilities of national peace and union.

Another highly interesting Korean character is His Excellency Song Piung-chun, the Minister of Home Affairs, an intelligent and fine looking young man, who is trying to help his country in every way. Among other things, he is endeavoring to make the women give up the heavy cloaklike hoods with which they conceal their faces in the street. He is also resuscitating the ancient arts of the people. One of these is a sort of inlaid shell work, said to be very beautiful. No attempt will be made to alter the regular national costume, which is that of China previous to the Manchurian conquest. It will probably eventually disappear before the march of progress, for, though it is stately and dignified, it is not adapted to active work. And active work is coming to Korea. Commerce is beginning to whiten her harbors and rattle through her peaceful streets. Above all, she is stretching forth her hands, as perhaps no nation ever has done before, for education and for religion. Schools and churches are multiplying there, but the missionaries report that they are utterly unable to provide buildings or teachers as fast as they are wanted.

A correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sends inspiring news from Seoul. She says, in part:

"The Woman's Academy here was founded about twenty years ago, as a school for little girls. In those early days there was much suspicion and ignorance to overcome. It was even said that the potent medicines of the foreigners were made from the eyes of children; but gradually prejudices were conquered until our academy became quite popular.

"At first, all the expenses of the pupils had to be paid by the school; but, little by little, they were shifted off upon the parents. At first, we began to require the girls to bring their own clothing and bedding. In another year or two, they were asked to pay a little toward their board. Next, they were made to furnish their own books; and so on, until now the academy is almost self-supporting, and it is none the less popular because of this. The Lord's Crown Jewels

TEXT—MAL. 3: 17: "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels."

MALACHI, the prophet, stands midway between Moses and our Saviour. He takes both a retrospective and a prospective view. As he looks back, he sees the Israelites released from bondage, crossing the Red Sea, their lives preserved through the forty years of desert wandering, then crossing the Jordan, taking possession of the "promised land," dividing it among the tribes, again and again falling into the worship of false gods, and suffering punishment for their unfaithfulness. Seeing finally how they rob God in tithes and offerings, he urges them to renounce their shameful wickedness and repent and return to the paths they have forsaken.

As he looks into the future, he sees the world being prepared for Christ, the dense darkness of its wickedness, the dispersion of the Jews, a universal language spoken, then his birth, preservation, youth and young manhood, his preparation for his work, his prosecution of it among men, his treading the winepress alone down through the judgment hall, and up the steep of Calvary to his tragic death upon the cross.

He peers on down the centuries, and beholds the church as its progress ebbs and flows in the different centuries, even to the high tide in the nineteenth and twentieth, and thence to the final judgment. It is that to which our text refers, when the prophet says in the name of the Lord: "They shall be mine in that day when I make up my jewels."

Earth's Rarest Possessions

Jewels are the rarest treasures that we possess, the costliest of earth's possessions; rubies and diamonds are the most valuable of jewels. Diamonds of any considerable size are worn only by those in high estate. The Kohinoor diamond that was worn by Queen Victoria, weighed 106 carats, and was valued at $600,000; the Great Yellow diamond shown in the Tiffany Pavilion, both in Chicago and Buffalo, weighed 125 carats, and must have been of more value than the Kohinoor. The Orloff diamond, owned by the Emperor of Russia, was valued at $1,000,000, while the Jubilee diamond found in South Africa in 1893, and exhibited at Paris in 1900, weighed 239 carats and was estimated at $2,000,000, while early in 1905 a diamond was found in Pretoria that weighed 3,030 carats and was valued at from three to four millions of dollars.

But God did not mean such rubies and diamonds when speaking of "his jewels." He meant his peculiar treasures, his saints, and the writer used the term that expressed the greatest value to the human mind, which was "jewel." The term jewels not only expressed great value, but great beauty as well. Think of a necklace set with five hundred diamonds, so great in value that it must be owned by a syndicate.

You have seen the crowds that gathered before some great plate glass front window looking at the display of diamonds, and the jeweler as he looked over them from within, so well acquainted with them that he knew each one by name, and the price of each one. This is only a picture of our heavenly Father as he looks on this world, his treasure house. He knows the name of each of his jewels and its price, that was paid on Calvary.

God's Jewels

The botanist puts all the flowers with a certain kind of root, stem, branch, leaf, flower and fruit into one class, and gives it a name; the mineralogist places the stones of like cleavage, hardness and specific gravity into a class and gives it a name; the zoologist places all the animals of like habits and appearances into a class and gives them a proper class name, and says that he has simplified nature; and so we call him a scientist.

Let us then classify God's jewels for our study. For the first group, let us think of the prattling babes that have been called from earth to heaven. If there is a mother present this morning who has been compelled to lay down that little darling—cold in death—that was dearer to her than life itself, and then see the little casket lowered amidst flowers into the open grave, and then go back to that now lonely home—ah, dear mother, let me assure you to-day that your little one is safe in the bosom of the heavenly Father, for it is one of his jewels; it is safe in his heavenly home.

The next group we would see is the new-born babe in Christ. You have seen the one who in the last moment has accepted the Saviour, and the tear is glistening in the eye, and the smile of satisfaction playing upon the countenance. How the heavenly Father must rejoice over him as do the angels! We and they rejoice together over one sinner that repents.

There is another large group we would mention, the prodigals that have gone out from the Father's house, feeding on the husks of the world. We see one of these as he arises and says, "How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare!" Then as he starts upon his return how the Father's heart rejoices, for he loves him, and goes out to meet him. He is one of his jewels to be welcomed and treasured in the Father's home.

Then there is another group that I fear is many times not mentioned as it should be, the group composed of those that some one has said rock the cradle of the government. I refer to the Christian mothers of our land, who gave and are giving their very lives in furnishing our Christian young women to be wives and queens in the home, and the fitting helms of our statesmen who stand at the helm and guide the ship of state aright. Dear mother, do not feel that your work is not one of priceless worth; that there is not a crowning reward for it. God will not forget your labor of love and its blessed fruits. You are counted among his most precious jewels.

There is one other group upon which we must look for a moment. This group is made up of aged saints, whose forms are bent, whose walk is lame, who are ripening for the grave as the shock of corn for the harvest. It was our privilege one morning to be seated early in the church and see the large audience gather for worship. Soon we noticed a very elderly lady borne on the arm of a daughter coming down the aisle to seemingly an accustomed place; then a little later, an old gentleman limping down to his usual seat in the house of God. These spoke forcibly to me of the burdens they had borne in the heat of the day. Now as their sun is rapidly sinking beneath the western horizon, how great a privilege it seemed for them to worship God in this place so full of memories sacred to their hearts. These aged Christians are also among his rare treasures. Young man, young woman, never do you grow too large but that it shall be a coveted privilege to bear your sainted father or mother down to the accustomed place in the house of God.

The Preciousness of Christ

Earthly jewels are very valuable, and we give them names. We give our children names because they are precious to us; we even give the more valuable animals names, but not to the less valuable. We give diamonds names because of their extraordinary worth, as the Kohinoor, valued at $600,000, the Great Yellow, valued at even more, or the Great White diamond, valued at a quarter of a million dollars, or the Jubilee diamond, worth $2,000,000, or the Pretorian at $4,000,000. A small ring may cost a large sum of money because it is set with a diamond. Diamonds have even cost men their lives. Sanci, a Frenchman, sent his trusty servant to carry a diamond of value to King Henry III., and as he passed through a dangerous place he was attacked by robbers, who demanded the treasure; but the servant would not give it up, but rather gave up his life. Sanci, when told that his servant had been killed by robbers, said he was sure that he had not given up the precious diamond, and upon opening the body found the diamond, which had been swallowed. It had cost the faithful man his life at the hands of the robbers. But for you and me to be counted among God's jewels, it cost the life of his only son, Jesus, our Saviour.

It did not only cost him his life upon the cross, but how much more than that! Think of Gethsemane with its sweat of blood. Think of his betrayal with a kiss by one who has been with him for three years and should have been a bosom friend. Then rudely arrested and brought into the judgment hall to be tried, and there denied by his friends upon whom he must rely later to tell the story of his life upon which the world is to depend for redemption; then, after judgment is pronounced by a cowardly judge, see him as he bears his own cross and through the weakness of his body falls under it, so that Simon the Cyrenian must come to his assistance. Then when he is nailed to the cross, and it is raised up to its place, he sees his murderers, and lifts his face to heaven and says, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." Now come long hours of agony on the cross, and finally, slow with head bowed, and in a hushed tone, he said, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost. All this cost: not only the death on the cross, but the agony and the bloody sweat of Gethsemane, the bitter grief of betrayal by a pretended friend, a cowardly denunciation, and the most cruel and shameful suffering of the Son of the living God, that you and I may be called God's crown jewels.

Diamonds are not always brilliant when first found. Sometimes a diamond is cut down to sixteenth of its former size. You may have seen a diamond-cutter at work. It sometimes requires a whole year to cut and polish a single diamond. God's jewels are often in the rough when first found, and it takes a long time and many laborious processes to burnish and polish one and make it ready to wear in Christ's royal diadem. There are different means by which the lustre is brought out of his most precious treasure.

The Ladder of Fame

A young man is very ambitious to become an eminent scholar, and all his strength, time and energy are given to study and other efforts to climb the ladder of fame, but not any of these for service for the Lord, which he requires of each of us; and the ambitious young man may be brought to a bed of affliction to find in the end how precious and blessed were its sanctified uses, for the curing of his faults and the perfecting of his character.

Some men give their entire time to the accumulation of wealth, and do not give any time or means to the building up of God's kingdom. Such men are often brought back to the beginning the third time before they will say, "I will give a due portion of my increase unto the Lord's service, and will worship him as Lord of all."

A mother may lavish all her affection upon a child, and therefore may be called to give it up. She would not take any love from the child, but God commands that we love him and serve him supremely and have no other gods before him.

There are disappointments that have their punishing influence upon us, and that bring the very best out of our lives. For example, Job's loss of wealth and family brought out that sublime declaration: "Though he slay me, yet will I trust him; and all the world is made richer thereby."

A woman who had been on a bed of affliction for a great many years, one day dropped off into sleep and dreamed that she had been carried away to a place where they were polishing precious stones. As she stood before one of the burnishers, who was using a little bluestone very roughly, she asked, "Why do you use the bluestone so roughly?" The man stopped for a moment and said, "The king was down the other day, and ordered this little stone gotten ready for his crown." When the woman awakened from her dream she said, "I understand now why I have had all this suffering, and why I am used so roughly, as it seems. I am being made ready for the king's royal diadem." So with many of us when we are called upon to bear severe sufferings or other trials. We are being burnished and polished in order that we may shine in the King's crown, and that great day when he makes up his jewels.

The Two Ways

We have spoken thus far to Christian people. God bids me say to those of you who are not Christians that there are two ways before you, the broad way which leads to destruction, and the narrow way which leads to life everlasting. This morning you are standing at the place where the ways divide; will you not step into the narrow way, and walk it although there may be trials and afflictions, burdens and sorrows in that way? At the end there rejoicing forevermore.

The Lord of hosts means by his jewels those who have sought him and found peace in forgiveness of sin. They accepted the price paid on Calvary, and are being made ready by the trials and afflictions of this life to shine in his royal diadem, in that great day when we shall come up from the East and the West, the North and the South, and sit down around the throne with that immortal throng, whose garments have been made white with the blood of the Lamb, and therefore are before the throne of God to serve him forever in the beauty of holiness.

NEW YORK'S NEW FARM SCHOOL

METHODS of dealing with boys whose love of study has never been properly developed, and who "play truant" at every opportunity, are being rapidly changed from the unscientific and haphazard ways that have been in vogue so long, and which often defeat the purpose for which they are employed. In most cases the boys are not really bad, but home training has been lacking and an excess of animal spirits leads them on until, from playing truant, they turn to something worse. The School Board of the City of New York realizing this has provided for a Parental School for habitual truants. This parental school, while accomplishing what many of the reform schools have done, will endeavor to take the place of the parents who have failed in rearing their boys. All of this will be done in a way to leave little after sting to those who are committed to its care, and the stigma attached to having been "sent up" will in great measure be wanting.

Flushing, Long Island, has been chosen as the site of the new school. It will be about a mile from the village on the road to Jamaica, in beautiful rolling country that is a delight to the eye with its wide green fields and groves of fine trees for which the vicinity of Flushing is famous. One hundred and seven acres have been purchased and quite a little village of cottages and school buildings are under construction. The land and buildings will cost the City of Greater New York, in which Flushing is situated, the sum of $705,498. Fifteen structures will be erected, most of them arranged about the sides of a large common with a distance between each building, thus avoiding the ordinary institutional effect of several buildings huddled about an ordinary court. The buildings are both serviceable and artistic. The cottage and school halls are in anodified Mission style and remind the beholder of many of the buildings seen in the lower part of the State of California. There are wide porches and peaked roofs. The buildings will be an addition and not a disfigurement to the countryside, as is so often the case with schools of this character.

The boys will live in eleven of the cottages; there are residence cottages for the principal of the school and his assistants, a power house, and an administration building. In the last will be many of the schoolrooms. Thirty boys will be assigned to a cottage under the charge of a master and a matron.

Buildings of the New York Farm School for Truants

The boys will be constantly under the oversight of the master; they will eat in their respective cottages, the meals being brought through subways from the central kitchen situated in the power house. Not being burdened with the culinary department, the matrons and their assistants will be free to look after the rooms and the clothing of the boys whom the city has committed to their care.

Farming and gardening will be made important features of the courses of work and study that have been prepared. The farm buildings are about fifteen hundred feet from the school village, and it is expected that the boys will raise on the nearby fields all of the vegetables necessary to supply the Parental School as well as the other truant schools in the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn. In addition to the courses in agriculture and horticulture, there will be courses in manual training, the boys being carefully grounded in the principles of the trades, carpentry, metal working, etc.

Character building is the main aim of the institution's instructors in charge. Self-control, obedience, and industry—true manliness—are to be taught in the schoolrooms and workrooms, and in the hours spent in the cultivation of the soil. The complete change from the cramped, unhealthy, and often vicious home surroundings to the orderly life of the Parental School cannot but exercise a most beneficial influence on the bodies and minds of the truant boys and do much toward setting them on the road to good citizenship.

To get the full benefit of the training and get the boy who has been committed to the school weaned at all from his former habits at least nine months must be spent at the institution. The present truant schools in New York and Brooklyn are greatly overcrowded and the tendency has been to parole them too soon on account of lack of accommodations. The result has been that thirty per cent. have been returned to the schools for breaking their paroles. Many now sent to the city truant schools will be put in the farm school to relieve this congestion and enable the school authorities to keep truants under restraint for longer periods than formerly. The new teachers are being selected with great care.

Last year there were 587,380 children of school age in Greater New York and only 940 of these were committed to institutions on the complaint of school officials, a very small proportion of the whole and one that speaks volumes for the desire of the pupils to receive the advantages of the American public school, and also for the devotion to their task of the teachers who have them in charge.

THE LARGEST VACATION BIBLE SCHOOL

PHILADELPHIA Christian workers are taking justifiable pride in the fact that their city has this year jumped to the front in Daily Vacation Bible School Work. Eighteen schools in as many different sections of the city have had a daily average attendance of over 1,200 children and a total enrolment of over 3,570. This is six more schools than were conducted last year in Philadelphia, and three more than have been going on in New York City the present season. And it is a remarkable record for the second year of the enterprise.

The work has been most systematically and intelligently planned by three committees, working harmoniously together. These committees were the Church Federation Committee, Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, chairman; the Presbyterian Children's Committee, Rev. Dr. C. A. R. Janvier, chairman; and the Women's Committee, Mrs. Edwin C. Grice, chairman. A public meeting at Holy Trinity Parish some inaugurated the movement, which was entered into with vigor and enthusiasm by consecrated workers from a dozen different churches and all the leading denominations, effectively aided by Rev. Dr. Robert G. Boyle of New York City, national director, who made frequent trips to Philadelphia in the interest of the work.

Speaking of its progress, Dr. Boyle said: "We have been greatly lessened in the work accomplished in Philadelphia this year. Philadelphia has instanced New York City, which formerly had the lead in numbers. No doubt the plan of Vacation Bible Schools is a popular one and has come to stay.

Miss Elizabeth Helm has served as supervisor of the industrial work. Crozer Seminary sent two students with expenses paid to act as teachers; Bryn Mawr sent one kindergarten graduates were brought in special cars adorned with flags and streamers to take part in the closing exercises and service of song, praise and prayer. A remarkable exhibition was made of the industrial work, which included everything from paper folding and kinder-the Gospel ministry to the boys and girls of the neediest and most crowded communities and have opened the doors of scores of church buildings to a blessed form of foreign missionary work at home. J. A. S.

A Touching Memorial Service

A memorial service in honor of the late Rev. Donald Sage Mackay was held in the Gospel Settlement, 211 Clinton Street, New York City, on August 30. Superintendent Hallimond of the Bowery Mission, who had been on terms of intimacy with Dr. Mackay, spoke feelingly of his great interest in the Bowery Mission. No minister in New York loved it as he did. The evening on which he invited Mr. Hallimond to bring some of the saved men of the Mission to his church, he tried to insist upon the Bowery Mission pastor putting on his gown before entering the pulpit, but he had to yield to his refusal. Dr. Mackay showed in every way that his church people honored the Bowery Mission flock as welcome guests. About five years ago he chose one of our Bowery Mission saved men as mission Superintendent and he has since done excellent work on the West Side. The men of the Bowery Mission deeply appreciated the interest Dr. Mackay took in the work of the Mission.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: It gives us pleasure to say that the premium, "Animal Stories," is a most pleasing work. It is truly surprising how you can afford to give such a book for so small a consideration. We are glad to be numbered with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. S. H. TIDBALL & FAMILY. Indianola, Ia.

ONE LITTLE CHINESE ORPHAN

By BISHOP JAMES W. BASHFORD

I.
IT WAS some thirty years ago. The little girl had no name. She was a Chinese girl. She was not an orphan in the American sense of the term; but she was an orphan in the far deeper sense that her grandfather had ordered her mother to take her out and drown her a few days after her birth, because she was only a girl. The Chinese reverence age, and the grandfather has the power of life and death over his children and his grandchildren. But this Chinese mother loved her child the same as American mothers love their children, and the Chinese mother took the little girl in her arms with a sad heart and went out to drown her in obedience to the command of her husband's father.

II.
On her way to the pool of water, the mother caught a glimpse of a missionary riding in her chair. The missionary was Miss Gertrude Howe, one of the most honored and loved missionaries in all Central China. She was going forth to her work that morning with a heart full of gratitude for the heavenly Father's kindness to her and for the privilege of working together with the Master for the redemption of the Chinese. Suddenly she was startled by the Chinese mother rushing up to her, the babe in her arms and tears streaming down her face, begging her to adopt the baby. The question of adopting babies in China had been before the workers upon the field and had been referred by them to the home authorities for decision. The home authorities felt that the missionaries were sent to China to evangelize the Chinese and to train the Chinese children, and that they could not do the work for which they were sent if they personally adopted children and had to give their time to the care of half a dozen or a dozen adopted Chinese orphans. Hence the committee at home had forbidden the missionaries in China to adopt orphans. Miss Howe was obliged, therefore, to refuse to take the baby. Her heart ached within her as the mother pleaded the baby's cause and stated that otherwise the little one must be drowned before she returned home. Miss Howe, however, remained loyal to those who sent her to the field and firmly declined to take the baby. The mother turned away broken-hearted.

III.
Throughout the day Miss Howe's heart often smote her as she thought of the little baby drowned in the pool whose life she might have saved. The little one's fingers clasped its mother's finger, oh so tight, and when the mother started to drop the baby into the water, her heart failed her, and at dark she was still wandering along the streets far away from the home to which she did not dare to return. Miss Howe was returning home, weary and heavy-hearted. The mother again caught sight of Miss Howe's chair. She ran toward the chair, and as she came within a few feet of it, she literally tossed the baby into the chair and disappeared in the crowd upon the street. Miss Howe picked up the crying infant and carried it to her home. She certainly could not drown the baby herself. She promptly wrote the women at home, telling them what had happened. They wrote Miss Howe to keep the baby. She named her Ida Kahn, fed her, clothed her, educated her as far as possible in China, and then sent her to America, where she graduated and then completed a medical course at the University of Michigan. Doctor Kahn returned to China as a worker of the Woman's Board some five years ago, and Miss Howe's responsibility for her upbringing and education was at an end. But God's purpose in this strange case was not at an end; and it now began to manifest itself.

IV.
The city of Nanchang has perhaps a million inhabitants. It is the capital of the Kiangsi Province. It is the gateway to the Yangtze River, with its flood of traffic, for the Kiangsi valleys lying back of Nanchang with their fifteen or twenty million people. The city was the only one in Central China able to resist the Taiping rebels. Thus it maintained its existence and its prosperity, when Nanking, Wuhu, and the other leading cities of the Yangtze valley were destroyed. This made it the commercial metropolis of the province and filled its people ple with pride and devotion to the ancient gods who had delivered them from their enemies. Missionaries could find no entrance to the hearts of the people and missionary work gained no strong foothold in that city.

V.
When Miss Kahn returned to America with her medical training and went with Miss Howe to live at Nanchang, her providential opportunity came. She began to treat the wives of the gentry and of the officials; her fame went abroad among the leaders of the city, and they eagerly offered to buy the land and erect a hospital and allow her to teach the Christian religion, if she would only remain among them and attend to their mothers and wives and daughters. The land has been bought, at an anti-foreign riot, arising over a dispute between the Chinese officials and the Roman Catholics in 1906, was delayed the erection of the hospital. But this very riot demonstrated the power of the Gospel and of Christian friendship in a providential manner. Miss Howe and her daughter by adoption, Doctor Ida Kahn, were saved by the Chinese out of the city when the riot began, and our Methodist missionaries in charge of the school for girls and of our hospital and other work in Nanchang were placed on board a boat furnished by the chief official and were carried without harm up the Poyang Lake to Kiukiang.

But more providential than the saving of the lives of the missionaries is the fact that this little waif, who was taken into Miss Howe's home and heart about 1875, has helped to open up to the Gospel a city of a million people and a valley of fifteen to twenty million inhabitants. What may we expect from the two thousand orphans whom the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD propose to help Dr. Klop support in China?

our school, goes the teaching of the heart. The Bible is studied as thoroughly as the arithmetic, and all our girls are Christians.

"Our musical department is very successful. The Koreans are fond of singing and will readily deny themselves to pay an extra charge for musical instruction.

"Each of our pupils has had seven years in the primary schools. We educate them for teachers, but they make good homekeepers as well.

"Five girls graduated last year. Of these Hannah is perhaps the most promising—a devoted Christian and a fine student. She was married soon after commencement, but she and her husband will still teach in Mokpo, a town in Southern Korea. Sinai, Pongumie, Wongumie, and Mattie were the other graduates. Sinai is as merry as any American girl, but a true and loving Christian. Pongumie carried the audience quite away with her eloquence when she delivered her graduating essay. Wongumie knows the entire New Testament almost by heart.

"We shall have to turn many away this year for lack of room. We sadly need more buildings and more teachers."

Thus is light coming to this long darkened kingdom. Japan holds down Korea with an iron hand, but she allows it to have schools and churches. The whole Christian world should unite to see that schools and churches, of the best, and in full measure, are provided, and that Korea is won for Christ.

Many readers of this journal have evinced a warm interest in the spread of the Gospel in the "Herm Kingdom" and have contributed toward its propagation. They now have the inward satisfaction of seeing that their gifts and their prayers have not been in vain.

OUR ORPHANS AT OORFA

MISS CORINNA SHATTUCK, the well-known missionary at Oorfa, Armenia, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

"I cannot refrain from an expression of deepest gratitude for all the help you and your CHRISTIAN HERALD staff have been to me, from the beginning of our distress in 1895 to the present date, by the general relief sent for all classes of sufferers; by the special support of nearly forty orphans for a period of several years, and since 1900 in acting as my deposit treasury for nearly $5,000 carefully used for special difficulties to the present date.

"You should know that, in looking over your list of CHRISTIAN HERALD boys, I find many of our very best. They are widely scattered. One is in South America, in a fine position as an educator; one graduates in June from our Theological Seminary in Marath. One this year completes his medical course at Beirut College; another is there preparing for dispenser (brother of the doctor). One has been a successful dentist for several years; one is an instructor in Mardin American School Industrial Department, being our first to take full a certificate from the Cabinet and Carpentry Department in our Oorfa Industrial Institute. Two are running engines for flour mills, having been trained by us here. One is peculiarly useful to us in our machine shop and is likely to make a good engineer. One is a teacher for us at the farm and has the care of our seven horses. I might go on to tell of others equally useful and good.

"Our work has so widened that I am perplexed as I try to hold on till relief shall come. Our industries for women and girls give employment to 2,000, including four towns within two days from Oorfa."

REMINISCENCES OF IRA D. SANKEY

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE recent death of Mr. Sankey has revealed more fully perhaps than ever before the vital part which he and Mr. Moody have played in the great civilizing movements of the last fifty years. As the stirring scenes have been recalled of the gigantic meetings which they conducted; and as during the years, the records have come in of the deep and lasting effects of those meetings; it must have been realized by even the most determined doubters concerning what has been termed "emotional evangelism," that here, at least, was emotional evangelism which "made good."

And ever and again in this record has been proven the immemorial power of the "gospel song." The hyper-refined and fastidious critic may decline to name the simple melodies of the dead singer as "music;" but, nevertheless, they belong in the category of those powerful elemental strains which find the human heart—the harps of the pines, the murmur of the brooks, the shrill piping of the winds. Many of Mr. Sankey's hymns sprang spontaneously to meet the needs of the hour, as he saw the crowds of seeking ones gathering at the feet of Mr. Moody, like lost and bewildered sheep huddling about their shepherd. No one will ever know how fully these touching verses, with their usually more touching melodies, met those pressing needs.

Records!" said Mr. Moody when some one asked him for the records of the numbers of those who have been converted under his preaching; "why, they are kept only in heaven!"

One is struck in reading Mr. Sankey's interesting book, My Life and the Story of the Gospel Hymns, with the remarkable way in which Providence prepared him for the great work he was to do. He was born of religious parents in what was then "the Middle West"—the part of the country in which "the great average" was fairly struck—and it was for the innumerable "average man" that Sankey's chief work was to be done. He had a war experience which thrilled and stirred him in depths which might otherwise never have been opened in his nature; and his first religious experiences were in the Methodist Church, in which the fervors of song are perhaps most generally and deeply cherished.

The story of his first meeting with Mr. Moody has already been told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It illustrates vividly the wonderful acumen of Moody. Mr. Sankey relates another instance of this:

At a great meeting in Chicago, Mr. Moody noticed

The first of these was the first solo that he ever sang in a Moody meeting.

The history of the famous "Ninety and Nine" is most extraordinary. Mr. Sankey had found the poem by chance in a corner of a Scotch newspaper, which he was reading on a train. He detected at once its great possibilities—but how was he to get a tune for it?

Sankey at the Beginning of His Public Career

That very week, Mr. Moody preached upon "The Prodigal Son." At the conclusion of his discourse, the aged Dr. Horatius Bonar made a few remarks, thrilling the immense audience with his fervid eloquence. Then Mr. Moody said, "Mr. Sankey, have you an appropriate solo with which to close the service?"

"I had nothing suitable in mind," writes Mr. Sankey, "but at that moment a voice seemed to say to me, 'Sing the hymn you found on the train!' I thought it impossible, but I placed the little slip on the organ in front of me, lifted my heart in prayer, and began to sing. Note by note, the tune was given, and it has not been changed from that day to this."

Another of the favorite "prodigal" hymns was, "Come Home, O Prodigal, Come Home." When this was rendered one night at Sunderland, England, a deep hush prevailed throughout the singing, until, just at the conclusion, a cry echoed through the building, "O father, will you forgive me?" and a young man rushed from the back part of the room down the middle aisle to the pew where his father was sitting.

"This incident," says Mr. Sankey, "made a profound impression upon the whole congregation, and hundreds of penitents retired to an adjoining room for prayer and consultation."

It seems hardly possible that within the lifetime of a man no older than Mr. Sankey, such a tremendous change has taken place as he records, concerning the use of instruments in accompanying church singing.

When in 1857 he took charge of the music in the Methodist Church in Newcastle, Pa., many of the members thought that the use in the choir of any sort of a musical instrument was "wicked and worldly." One or two old men left the church on account of the introduction of the organ some years later.

He encountered the same spirit in Scotland in 1873. No "human hymns," as they were called, were sung then in many of the Scotch churches. The Psalms of David were the only poetry permitted, while some of the good people alluded disrespectfully to the small cabinet organ which Mr. Sankey took everywhere with him, as "a kist o' whistles."

It was during this wonderful trip that an English clergyman from Sunderland first used the expression, "singing the Gospel," in describing Mr. Sankey's soul-moving hymns.

Nothing could have been more discouraging than the circumstances under which Moody and Sankey started on this great expedition. They arrived in England only to find that, by a singular combination of circumstances, the two clergymen at whose invitation they had come had just died. The evangelists did not know what to do. An old letter from a Y. M. C. A. secretary was finally found, in which he had invited them to come to York. Thither, therefore, they turned their steps, but they found the gentleman much altered. He did not see any way now of carrying on a series of meetings.

At last, an Independent chapel was secured in that town, a meeting was appointed there, and from that time forward God blessed abundantly the efforts of the two Gospel workers. It was during this great campaign that the conversion occurred of the inspired Gospel preacher, Gypsy Smith, an event most thrillingly described in Mr. Sankey's Life.

Shortly after their return to America, the evangelists held a series of meetings at Princeton University, during which Milton Merle Smith, now a beloved pastor of a great New York church, first announced his conversion and his determination to become a minister. Thus spread the leaven of these two wonderful men.

One of the amusing incidents told by Mr. Sankey involved a sort of an obituary of himself, such as seldom comes to a living man. He fell into conversation with a stranger on a train near Chicago. They fell to discussing the meetings of Moody and Sankey, which were just then the talk of the town. The man said that he had never seen either of them, but he did wish he could have heard Sankey sing "The Ninety and Nine" before he died.

Mr. Sankey remarked that he had often heard Moody preach and Sankey sing, but that he had not read of the death of the latter.

"Oh, but I saw it in the papers," said the man.

"It must be true, if you saw it in the papers," admitted Mr. Sankey.

"What kind of folks are they, anyway?" inquired the man.

"Oh, just common folks like you and me," replied the great singer.

When, a little later, the man rose to leave the train, Mr. Sankey said to him, "I think it is hardly fair that we should part without telling you that I am one of the men we have been talking about."

"Why, who are you?" he asked.

"I am what is left of Sankey."

The man gave the singer a quizzical look and said, "You can't play that on me, old fellow. Sankey is dead." And he left, as strong as ever in his conviction.

The brother of the author of "Just as I Am,"

Moody and Sankey Planting Trees in Scotland

a usher, with a wand in his hand, who was making himself quite conspicuous.

"Who is he?" inquired the great preacher. "I don't like his looks."

It was Guiteau, the man who afterward shot President Garfield.

The "sanctified common sense" of Mr. Moody was in no respect more keenly manifested than in his discernment of the part which hymns and deeply emotional melodies must play in his evangelistic scheme. Humbly he over and over asserted, "My work would be next to nothing, but for the hymns which clinch and drive deep home the truths which I try to speak."

Some of his most powerful discourses bore upon the return of wandering ones, and for accompanying those, certain compositions of Mr. Sankey's, especially, "Come Home, O Prodigal Child," and "The Ninety and Nine," were particularly adapted.

The Evangelist at Karnak on the Nile

though he was an eloquent divine, often remarked that this one hymn of his sister's had done more for religion than all his preaching.

Who can compute the good that has been done by many of these modern hymns also! Some of them are commonplace; but many are made of the stuff that lives. They touch the nobler part of us; they are identified with vital moments in our lives and in those of others; and a line here and there in even a halting stanza, is often so full of lofty passion and aspiration, or illumined with such visions of glory, that it redeems the rest, however commonplace; and it is generally a few fine lines which give their chief value to the most famous poems.

Mr. Sankey testified that Dwight L. Moody was the greatest and noblest man that he had ever known; and the world more and more, as the years pass, will accord to Mr. Sankey no small measure of that same greatness and nobility.

Sunday School Conversions

IT IS an old and somewhat trite saying that "figures cannot lie." One need not be an expert arithmetician, however, to know that figures can be made to prove almost anything, whether the result will stand the test of calm, sober reason or not.

We make this observation apropos of a communication that has reached us from a very worthy clergyman in New York State, who has been making certain calculations based on the statistics of recent Sunday School National Conventions. He sets forth his conclusions as follows:

In a grand total of 14,000,000 American Protestant Sunday School children of all ages and representing every denomination, there have been, approximately, only 1,000,000 conversions in three years, or an average of 333,500 yearly. Assuming the average period of Sunday School attendance to be eight years (from the ages of six to fourteen), the total conversions during the whole period would thus be about 2,668,000, leaving 11,000,000 children who pass out of the Sunday School unconverted. As it is generally conceded that about 55 per cent. of all conversions occur before the age of twenty, and assuming that a fair proportion of the children become converted during the four years after leaving Sunday School, there would still remain considerably over half of our Sunday School scholars untouched by the Gospel invitation. This great host of over 7,000,000 souls, he therefore concludes, "go down to death unsaved."

True or false, it is an appalling calculation. But is it true? Can these figures be relied on? Are Sunday School statistics, being largely voluntary and, to a great extent, based upon the personal impressions of superintendents, to be accepted as an absolute record of spiritual conditions in such cases? Are there not thousands—aye, possibly millions of young people who may be living the Christian life, yet who, through sensitiveness or for some other reason, have never made a public confession of Christ?

We should be seriously disposed to doubt the infallibility of such figures on this subject, even though the compiler bases his calculations on the statistics of national Sunday School conventions. He writes further: "Thousands and thousands of Sunday Schools run a whole year without a conversion. Over 2,000 Sunday Schools in one denomination had this record not long ago." This sweeping general statement invites criticism by its lack of detail, no matter with whom it originated. We should require more minute proof before accepting it as evidence. Closer investigation would probably disclose many real conversions, even where none were reported.

Divine grace has many ways of reaching the human heart. Our work is only the seed-sowing; the harvest is God's. The heart of a child is a sublime mystery to all but its Maker. Many a child of Christian parents, reared in a godly home, cannot point to the date of its conversion. These young hearts grow up with Christ from infancy. Besides, there are many natures so shy and sensitive that in spiritual things they cannot be judged by our ordinary human standards. The Gospel seed planted in childhood may germinate and blossom into fruitage years after we have lost sight of the child. Many have been won over at last by the memory of a mother's unforgetting prayers of earlier years. May not these undemonstrative young scholars have a like experience? Who shall say no? God can take care of his own work; and he may be trusted to see to it that the labor of his faithful servants is not in vain.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD desires to make a practical test of these astonishing figures. If true (as we sincerely hope and believe they are not), the whole Christian world should know the fact and prepare to face the emergency. If the fault lies with our present system; if the average teacher is untrained and inefficient, and incapable of feeling the zeal and inspiration for soul-winning which are at the root of all successful Sunday School effort; if the work has declined to a mere mechanical or perfunctory performance, then, indeed, it is time to sound the alarm. But first let us know the truth of the matter from those who are best qualified to speak on this subject. For the purpose of this test we invite the co-operation of Sunday School superintendents everywhere throughout the land. We ask superintendents of Sunday Schools of all denominations to write us briefly, stating the spiritual condition of their schools during the past twelve months, and giving the number of those whom they know to have become Christians during that time, either by public profession or in any way that can be interpreted as indicating a change in the heart and the life. One thousand reports from such sources would be a fair index of the whole.

We pin our faith on the Sunday Schools of America. They are the spiritual nurseries of our republic—the replenishers of the church. We believe our schools are going forward and not retrograding, and that God is using them as a mighty agency for the upbuilding of his kingdom.

Let us hear from the superintendents and get at the truth about this amazing assertion that more than seven millions of Sunday School children "are going down to death unsaved." By giving out the facts, a valuable service will be rendered the whole Christian world. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York.

Governor Fort's Battle

NEW JERSEY is to be congratulated on having in the Governor's chair a man who possesses the courage to brave public opposition, when he knows he is working in a righteous cause and for the State's best interests. When Governor John Franklin Fort, after full investigation into the condition of affairs at Atlantic City, decided that it needed a thorough moral clean-up, and that the Sunday closing law should be enforced, he found, to his surprise, all of the local officials, many of the business men and a crowd of greedy politicians jointly determined to thwart him. The grand jury failed to act, and the whole situation was one of sullen defiance of State authority. It was not unlike the attitude of the New York gamblers when Governor Hughes began his famous war on the race track betting evil. Fort showed himself of the same metal as Hughes. He issued a proclamation in which he unsparingly condemned Atlantic City for its open vice, its evil resorts, its tolerance of gambling and its excise law violations. He declared that the conditions amounted to a treasonable combination of officials and certain citizens to subvert the State laws, to which all other localities rendered obedience, and threatened to close the illegal saloons by military force. The threat proved effective. All the saloons were closed on the following Sunday. Of course, this is by no means the end of the battle. It will be transferred to the legislature and an attempt will be made by the politicians and their immoral allies to pass liberal Sabbath laws, permitting the saloons the freedom they desire—freedom to desecrate the Lord's Day, to debauch manhood, and to cater to the worst elements of the population. The good people of New Jersey can forestall this programme, and probably will, by organizing such a strong movement as will establish a bulwark to protect the beautiful resorts along the Atlantic coast from an inundation of Sunday saloons, drunkenness and their host of vicious accessories.

Last Week's Promise Fulfilled

LAST week we outlined in this column a preliminary announcement of unusual and mutual interest to our readers and ourselves, and now give the further details then promised.

We have in preparation the most artistic Home Circular ever issued by us. This circular is beautifully and profusely illustrated, and, of course, every one of our subscribers gets a copy as soon as it is issued. But in addition we are printing a million extra copies of this circular with which to reach and influence people who ought to be subscribers but are not now on our list.

Our subscribers know THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They love it and are interested in the extension of its work and influence. To them we appeal—confident of success—for the names necessary to carry out this extensive and expensive propaganda.

Every member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family knows the names of twenty-five adult Church or Sunday School attendants, who would welcome a very beautiful circular, full of interesting information, superbly illustrated in colors, and sent to them by mail, absolutely free of all expense. It is for these names that we now appeal. You supply them, you will supply them, and on you rely for the successful outcome of this effort.

While we are fully satisfied that the thought of compensation in connection with this labor of love would never occur to any of our readers, it does occur to us that some practical recognition of their help and co-operation would be eminently right and proper. Therefore, we will send to every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family, who sends us a list of names in accordance with the instructions at the foot of this column, together with ten cents in coin or stamps, a set of three superb intaglio photographs, which we guarantee to be securely packed and delivered unincreased and in perfect condition. For full descriptions see foot of page 722.

There is no further expense of any kind attached to this offer, as the pictures are sent all charges prepaid. We especially direct your attention to the date limit. Honors to the Marathon Winners

ONE of the most spectacular receptions since that tendered to Admiral Dewey was given in New York City Saturday, August 29, to the American athletes who won in the Olympic games in London the track and field championships of the world for the United States. There were 15,000 persons who marched in the parade, including Federal, State and city troops, and a large number of athletic organizations. The sixty-three athletes who were honored rode in automobiles. In front of them was a float, almost entirely covered with American flags, containing the trophy won in the games by Jim J. Hayes, the Marathon hero. The day was beautiful and the streets along the line of march were packed with men, women and children, and echoed with burst after burst of applause. Hayes, the Marathon winner, rode in the first car; with him were James E. Sullivan, President of the American Athletic Union, P. J. Conway, President of the Irish-American Athletic Club, Murphy, the trainer, and others of prominence in athletics, who were easily identified by the crowd. There was also great enthusiasm for J. B. Taylor, the negro member of the team, and for Frank Mont Pleasant and Iwanina, the Indians. A stand was built in front of the City Hall for the victors and those receiving them. Acting Mayor McGowan made an appropriate speech. Then the sixty-three athletes were called forward and the acting mayor pinned a gold medal upon the breast of each man, while the crowd cheered. The applause at the mention of the name of Hayes, the Marathon victor, was so long and loud that the aldermen lifted him up in their arms so that the people could see him, and set him on a table, while 1,200 school children sang as a chorus the National Hymn. On the Monday following, the heroes went to Oyster Bay, where the President of the United States gave them a royal reception.

The people have a right to be proud of these men who have won in this world contest. The people of the world knew that Americans were swift; but it was not thought that they had that endurance which characterizes some other races. Some of the old nations used to think too much of the development of the body, and some in modern times have made too little of it. Development of the physical life of a people is absolutely necessary to national success. Other things being equal, the mind and the heart will only be able to do as much as there is physical force to propel them. Valuable as bodily development is, it is only the beginning of that higher development of mind and soul so necessary to success in the later competitions of men. The contest along the paths of physical development and physical support is important; but the real race of life is along the tracks of the mental and the spiritual. The trophies won at the Olympic games are in keeping with the prizes our people are seeking in the mental, moral and spiritual contests of the world.

Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? so run that ye may obtain. (1 Cor. 9:24.)

Looking for His Son

Thomas Fletcher, a flour merchant of Cleveland, O., recently got on the track of his son, whom he turned adrift ten years ago for carrying against his wish.

Fletcher identified his son in a snapshot of the Queen and others riding in a car of the scenic railway at the Franco-British exhibition. In reply to advertisements asking those in the car with her Majesty to communicate with him nineteen persons wrote to Mr. Fletcher, none being the one looked for.

As there were at least twenty-five persons in the car there are still hopes that the son will be found. The father was deeply grieved at having to return to this country without having found his lost boy. How like the heart of the infinite is the love of a parent for the child!

And they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son. (Ech. 12:10.)

Destroyed Mother's Eye

On a hot day in August a woman at Eastport, Long Island, went down to the shore to give her children an outing and have a brief rest for herself. The children were playing in the sand while she held the babe in her arms. The babe aimlessly thrust its finger into its mother's eye, injuring it severely. She was taken to a hospital, where it was discovered that the sight of the eye had been destroyed and there was great danger that the sight of the other might also be involved.

The injury to the mother's eye, severe as it was, was not so great as the hurt which many a mother's heart receives from careless and rebellious children. The child was not to blame. It did not know what damage it was doing. Half of the sorrow of the world comes from the misconduct of others; much of the time through sheer carelessness and rashness of human conduct that is full of fault and sin and ingratitude to the hearts of loved ones. A son or daughter cannot be too careful of the feelings and instructions of faithful parents.

Then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. (Gen. 42:38.)

Foreign Missions and Civilization

William H. Taft was asked the other day at Hot Springs, Va., to talk into a phonograph, which he did. There was general curiosity to know what he had said, which was gratified when the talking machine made the following reproduction:

"I have known a good many people who were that are entitled to our effort and our money and our sacrifice to help them on in the world. No man can study the movement of modern civilization from an impartial standpoint and not realize that Christianity and the spread of Christianity are the only basis for hope of modern civilization in the growth of popular self-government. The spirit of Christianity is pure democracy. It is the equality of man before God—the equality of man before the law, which is, as I understand it, the most God-like manifestation that man has been able to make."

This is the opinion held by the late Colonel Denby, who was for twelve years our United States Minister to China, who severely criticised those who found fault with the practical workings of the missionaries in the Far East and said that they were the hope, and would be the salvation, of the people of the Orient.

Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. (Ps. 2:8.)

Meteorite in President's Yard

All the members of President Roosevelt's family, together with the servants and some of the Secret Service men, were searching the other day at Oyster Bay to find a meteorite which came flashing from the sky the night before. It startled the men on guard with its glow, and embedded itself deep in the ground behind the President's barn, it was thought, not one hundred yards away from his residence. The meteorite was of large size, for its light illuminated the ground for 200 feet on all sides of Sagamore Hill, making every tree and bush as visible as by broad daylight.

If such a thing had happened in olden times, the people would have said that it was an event of good or ill omen; that it meant some event of good or evil to the President or the nation. The belief was very general amongst many that the stars were divine and that the luminaries in the heavens controlled the destinies of men. We of to-day know that the event had no individual or national significance whatever; that it was only the casting off of a splinter from the mechanism of nature under the control of the Great Architect and Master Builder.

And it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground. (Dan. 8:10.)

The Leper and His Wife

John Early, a veteran soldier of the Civil War, came from his home in North Carolina on an errand to Washington. While there, it was discovered that he was afflicted with a well-defined case of leprosy. The health and police authorities immediately took charge of him and isolated him, putting a strict guard about his tent until such time as North Carolina could send and take care of him.

The first knowledge his wife had that he was a leper came through a telegraphic item in the newspaper from Washington. She took her little baby and hurried to the capital. She crept close to the camp the night she arrived and got a glimpse of her husband, who was bending over his Bible, trying to read in the dim rays of a little lamp. The guards stood aside and when Early saw his wife he exclaimed: "Lottie!" He stood with outstretched arms. She responded with arms outstretched, calling his name in tenderness. Almost the first words uttered by Early were: "I am a leper." Both wept in silence. After Early had regained his composure, there was a long talk about his condition, home affairs, and the terrible ordeals to be undergone by both in the future. The love of his wife prompted her to approach nearer the tent than the "dead line," and Early himself cried out, "Don't come! Don't come! I am unclean, unclean!" The wife begged the authorities for the privilege of nursing him and being consigned with him to his life of dreary solitude. There is one comfort in this terrible sorrow, one bright star in this dark night, and that is the faith that the afflicted man has in his Saviour, and a clean, pure heart and life made so by the blood of Christ. The fatal leprosy of sin was cured by the Divine Master. The devoted wife is sustained by the same spiritual consolation.

And, behold, there came a leper and worshiped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. (Matt. 8:2.)

ALCOHOL'S HARVEST OF WOES*

THE place in which we stand in this lesson is Jerusalem. The persons addressed by Isaiah are wicked King Ahaz and the "sinful nation" of Judah. Isaiah himself was the greatest of the major prophets, a scholar and a statesman, whose fearless words to wicked kings were like those of Elijah and Paul and John Knox. The time at which he spoke was one of luxury, which, as usual, proved more conducive to vice and intemperance than previous periods of poverty. God's judgments were about to burst in an Assyrian invasion on the northern kingdom, of which event Isaiah says in another passage (ch. 28), "Woe unto the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty shall be a fading flower." Isaiah declares that Judah, unless repentant, will for like sins follow Israel into captivity. These are but two of many illustrations of the truth that nations usually die of moral degeneration. Isaiah plainly declares that the chief cause of the approaching captivity of both Jewish kingdoms in Babylon is the captivity in which they are already voluntarily involved through drink. Nehemiah (13: 18) names Sabbath-breaking as another cause of the nation's fall.

The events of this lesson present the captives of drink as already gathering the first fruits of their harvest of woes.

"My well beloved had a vineyard in a very fruitful hill." The lesson really begins with the chapter. In a beautiful allegory, Isaiah compares God's people to a vineyard which he had planted and cultivated with unstinted love. "He gathered out the stones and planted it with the choicest vine and built a tower in the midst." All this recalls how God had driven out the Canaanites to give Israel a pure environment, and had pruned his vine by forty years of mercies and judgments to be fruitful for the world's good, and had divinely protected them against their foes. He had sent prophets to keep the vineyard. God exclaims, "What more could I have done for my vineyard that I have not done in it?" And what more could God have done for the United States that he has not done? He held back this continent till the hour had come when he could plant a spiritual church dissevered from corrupting alliance with the state. He planted here a brave religious people whom he had sifted by persecution. But our prosperity also has led many to sin. When God looked that we should bring forth grapes, we, too, brought forth "wild grapes." The reference is to the deadly nightshade, which produces berries that look like grapes, but are poisonous. So grapes rotted for wine are poisons offered as "health." Hear the words of John Wesley on these alcoholic poisons: "Liquors are a certain slow poison. Liquid fire lays the foundation of numberless diseases. Have we not reason to believe that little less than half the corn produced in the kingdom in every year is consumed, not by so harmless a way as throwing it into the sea, but by converting it into deadly poison—poison that naturally destroys not only the strength of life, but also the morals of our countrymen? Oh, tell it not in Constantinople, that the English raise the royal revenue by selling the flesh and blood of their countrymen. It is amazing that the preparing or selling this poison should be permitted in any civilized State. All who sell drams and spirituous liquors to any that will buy are poisoners general. They murder his majesty's subjects by wholesale, neither does their eye pity or spare. They drive them to hell like sheep. And what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men?"

In the Rapids

"Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow

"nightcap," with a "continued" thought all day for his next chance to drink. Such a man is in the rapids just above the Niagara of habitual drunkenness, and his friends often see it, but seldom does the victim himself know his danger. I heard of a man who suddenly discovered at seven o'clock in the evening that he was longing for nine o'clock, when he was wont to take his usual bedtime glass to promote sleep. It was to him the summed, or lie half burned next to the blaze. Occasionally, a moth would fly to the table, overcome with heat with enough life to keep its wings moving, and oftentimes the dying moth would crawl towards the same flame that had caused its suffering. "How strange!" thought the boy. "Can moths see these scorched and winged millers? Why will they rush into flame and be destroyed?"

"Here is a live miller unscorched. He has for the moment lit among the ones. There it goes. Ah! it falls. Its wings scorched and burned, dead. I should think that if moth millers were able to discern the light, they would have enough sense to discover the danger where so many are lost and dead."

The boy, even while wondering why moth millers did such foolish things, answered a whistle that came to him through the open window on his cap and hastened to the street with other boys. He visited a poolroom with them and looked on. He hung around a saloon. He looked through the open doorway as he heard a drunken brawl. A fight and arrest followed. Men with bloody faces were led away. He saw the once wealthy Mr. Jones reeling home after having spent his last cent on whisky. He listened to the filthy stories and lying tales. Ah, my boy, the wicked scorched and habit-bound man you see have flown into the flame, or are beating out their lives against its destroying heat. Are you no wiser than moth millers?

It is "for lack of knowledge" partly that men become captives of habit. It is our duty, to whom the warnings of experience or of science have come, to see that no one in all the world, so far as we can reach, is left without such warning as is given in the testimonies of American and German and other doctors against beer.

Great Men Conquered by Alcohol

"The honorable men are famished. It is amazing that young men should be such egotists as to say that they have nothing to fear from a foe that has laid low such great men as Homer and Addison and Sir George Trevelyan and Charles Lamb and Hart Coleridge and "Bonnie Prince Charlie"—all of these cited by Farrar for England—and such great Americans as Webster and Poe and Yates and many more. Gen. Nelson A. Miles long ago wrote to young men to avoid both bacco and intoxicants if they would give themselves the best chance for success.

Let us put against the sad cases I have named a President of the United States whose courageous abstinence is an inspiration. When Lincoln was a boy, almost everybody drank. Among those who were working for temperance in that early day was "Old Uncle John," as he was called, who gathered the people together for meetings in the rough log school houses of sparse settled communities. One long-to-be-remembered night he made his plea ending with an invitation to come forward and sign the pledge. There was only one who moved. A tall boy got to his feet and came up the aisle. Even in that rough audience he made an ungainly appearance in his sadly outgrown clothes, coarse and too short trousers and sleeves. But a hush fell on the rough men as that boy, with determination in his face, stooped to write the name "Abraham Lincoln" on the pledge. Lincoln always attributed much of his success in life to his temperance principles.

The Boy and the Moth Millers

strong drink!" It should be said that intoxicants are not really "strong drink." If they were, trainers of athletes would not bar them out. Mr. Reginald Rankin, who has won fame by accomplishing the ascent of Aconcagua, the highest peak of the Andes Mountains, speaking of the effects of alcohol upon the mountain climber, says: "Though alcohol is a bad thing to climb on, it is an excellent thing to toboggan down on when you have reached the summit of your ambition and never want to see it again."

Isaiah pictures here the man so fond of drink that his first waking thought is a craving for his "eye opener," as his last thought in the day is for his discovery of a chain. He quit at once, and before a day had passed discovered in his hard struggle how nearly too late he had been. Challenge your friend, who thinks drink has no hold upon him, to give it up for a week, and in many cases he will find how strongly he is already bound. If he is not bound, let him keep himself free.

The Boy and the Moth Millers

The boy watched the moth millers flutter around the lamp. Many of them would fly against the hot chimney and fall to the table, scorched and burned. Some of them would fly directly into the chimney and these would drop into the flame and be con-

THE "WORLD BOOK OF TEMPERANCE"

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD calls the earnest attention of Sunday School workers and temperance people of all lands to this new book, which may have great influence in safeguarding children everywhere against intoxicating drinks and drugs, and in answering through the Sunday Schools, in millions of homes, the sophistries of the liquor dealers' unprecedented "campaign of education." This book will contain forty temperance lessons—Biblical, historical, scientific—profusely illustrated with pictures, charts, stories and accurate statistics. It will be more than a lesson book—a comprehensive compend of the whole temperance question, with Bible commentary in brief; chronological notes of temperance history; temperance sayings of men of all lands; testimony of German, British, American and other scientists on alcohol, etc. Teachers of public schools as well as Sunday Schools; preachers also, and all temperance workers will need this up-to-date arsenal.

All money received for this book is to be devoted to its production and free circulation. The size of the book (not less than 100 pages) will depend on the number ordered in advance, for which only the cost of paper, presswork, binding and postage will be charged. An edition of 100,000, ordered in advance, will insure 400 pages. After publication the book will be sold at 75 cents, cloth; 35 cents, paper; but those who send cash orders in advance will get the book at the rate of 10 cents each, paper; 25 cents, cloth, for orders of not less than $1 worth. Send orders at once to International Reform Bureau, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

GOLDEN DAYS AT MONT-LAWN

SATURDAY and Sunday are always pleasant days at the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, even when the skies are overcast and the rain comes pouring down. There are occasions, however, when so much that is pleasant and interesting is crowded into one day that they may well be termed days to be marked with a white stone.

August 23 might be designated as a day worthy to be marked with a whole row of the smoothest, whitest pebbles. Mr. Robert Watchorn, Commissioner of Immigration of the port of New York, was present and gave a most spirited and inspiring address, couched in such simple language that even the smallest child present knew what he meant, and at the same time he listened to with the greatest interest by the grown-up portion of the audience, which packed aisles, ambulatory and every available vacant space. The pews are never encroached upon, for in the Children's Temple the little ones never crowded to make room for visitors.

Mr. Watchorn was profoundly impressed with the beautiful singing of the children in their opening song, especially the chorus "Then Hurrah for the flag—Our Country's Flag." At the word "hurrah" three hundred flags, which had been concealed until this moment, suddenly came into view, waved by small hands in time with the music, the whole chorus singing with a vim until the last word, when the flags disappeared as suddenly as they had come into view, only to appear again with the next signal word.

Dr. Klopsch, in introducing the Commissioner, said that he and the visitor were both born in Europe—Dr. Klopsch in Germany and Mr. Watchorn in England—and he introduced Mr. Watchorn as "my fellow immigrant." The latter made any interesting statements regarding immigration.

"We have thirty-five interpreters for the adults of different races and nationalities," he said jocosely, "but the babies all cry in one language."

In giving an illustration of the enormous figures which immigration to this country has reached, the speaker said that if every one coming over in a year were given word at the beginning of the Bible, and each one following were given a word, at the end there would be several thousand who would be without, as the supply of words would be exhausted.

Like Dr. Klopsch, Mr. Watchorn is a great lover of children; likes to be with them and talk to them, while they, in turn, are delighted to listen.

Mr. W. B. Howland, of the Outlook, followed in a happy vein, fairly capturing the children by his pleasant voice and easy manner. It was hard to determine which seemed the happier, the man in speaking or the children in listening.

Mr. John Beattie, who for thirty-three years has conducted the famous Bible class in the Union Methodist Episcopal Church in New York, then followed in a most interesting talk, in which he told, in a manner that brought tears to his listeners' eyes, how he was brought to God by the death of a little child whom he greatly loved, and who only stayed such a little while in his home.

The children seemed in unusual good voice, while they sang the "Glory Song," which was indeed a pleasure to hear. "Blossom Bells" was beautifully rendered, the girls singing one part and the boys another in a way which seemed wonderful to the listeners, when they were told that a large proportion of the children had been at Mont-Lawn less than a week, some scarcely forty-eight hours. Saturday and Sunday, August 29 and 30, were delightful days at the Home. Rev. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts were visitors and expressed themselves as delighted with the work carried on with such enthusiasm at Mont-Lawn. In the Temple on Sunday morning, Dr. Crafts gave a little talk especially to the teachers, telling the story of Moses, and designating his finding as the work of the first "Children's Aid Society." His address was listened to with attention by the children, who were especially pleased with a little talk on "Flags" given by Mrs. Crafts.

Dr. Madison C. Peters made a stirring address on the importance of boys being clean, both without and within, and of being thoroughly in earnest in all that they undertook. A large number of visitors came to the Children's Paradise on this occasion, many coming by rail and carriages from neighboring towns.

And so the weeks go gliding by on golden wings. Another season is waning, but the happiness which has been crowded into the hearts of these little ones in their brief sojourn in this lovely home can never be overestimated.

A SOLDIER'S PRAYER ANSWERED

WAS a soldier of the Civil War of 1861-65, belonging to the 11th New York Volunteers and the Ninth (General Burnside's) Army Corps. Our regiment took part in the bloody battle of Spotsylvania, Va., on the 12th to 14th of May, 1864.

The squad to which I was assigned was ordered to form a skirmish line on the extreme left. Before us was a "run" or small creek, hip-deep. On our side stood a few pines, scattered along the creek. On the other side, about fifty feet wide, was a clear space, and beyond that a dense thicket of underbrush, in which a line of Confederate skirmishers were concealed. On my right, perhaps 100 to 150 feet off, was a small knoll occupied by the guns of several batteries, but these were deserted, as the enemy kept a constant fire upon them, during which most of the artillerymen were killed, wounded or driven away. Around this knoll lay several dozen dead and wounded—some horribly mangled by shells.

The season was wet and cold, the red clay just at its best for potters or brickmakers. Often at night, lying on picket, the water would squash under our blankets. We had several attacks by the enemy's skirmish line, which we repelled, crossing and recrossing that "run," and feeling decidedly damp and uncomfortable.

My first experience of a battle impressed me with what death is. I besought the Lord in silent prayer, while on that line, to spare my life, and save me from such a horrible death.

My eye caught sight of a little book, open, wedged in the crotch of a pine sapling. I walked up to see what it was. It was a New Testament with Psalms appended, such as the U. S. Christian Commission gave to our soldiers. This one had seemed too burdensome to some one of the boys, and he threw it away. It was wet, and was open at Psalm 118, and the 17th verse caught my eye and seemed to be plainer than the rest. It read thus: "I shall not die but live, and declare the works of the Lord."

Imagine my surprise. I had not known such a verse to be in the Bible.

I felt as if my eyes had deceived me. I read it again and also the next verse (the 18th), but only to confirm the 17th. There was the direct and prompt answer to my supplication. The Lord heard my silent prayer.

Throughout that terrible campaign, although at Fort Stedman, Va., two Confederate officers emptied the contents of their revolvers at me, and I not over twenty-five to thirty feet from them, not one bullet struck me. I was neither sick in hospital, nor wounded, nor taken prisoner, but was always on duty. The Lord kept his promise to me, praised be his holy name!

The second incident was still more wonderful than the first: On the 26th of August, 1865, our regiment was discharged from service and ordered home to Rochester, N. Y., from Washington, D. C. Transportation was furnished in box and cattle cars, provided with rough board seats. The weather was sultry and a number of us preferred to stay on top. Night came on and the cars swayed to and fro a great deal, which made the ride on top rather dangerous. Lest I might get to dozing, I slipped my arm through the walking board that extended along the ridges, so as not to fall. About 1:30 A.M. a comrade of my company, James (or Elmer) Gray (now of Governor, N. Y.), felt as if he would suffocate from the foul air in the car, and hurried out on top to catch fresh air. But the Lord had work for him, for as soon as he came on top he saw a man's head and shoulders over the roof, and his legs just at the brake-wheel. I heard a far-away cry: "Say, here, wake up! wake up!" and as the cry came nearer, I felt my legs pulled and I awoke. My left arm clawed the air, my head hung over the side.

I shuddered as I realized what a timely rescue I had. Comrade Gray was led by the protecting hand of the Lord to come up for fresh air, just to that end of the car and just at the right moment to save me from a horrible death. Again I felt that it was the kind hand of the Lord alone. Praise to his holy name! A. WENTZ.

WANTED—A NOON SPELL

AFTER a long morning's work in the fields, the noon spell, when dinner and a rest refresh the toilers, is a welcome incident in the day's progress. Weary muscles relax, the men laugh and talk, they thoroughly enjoy the cessation for a little while from labor. If the day's work be not out of doors under the sky, but instead be limited to the cramped space behind the counter, or the stifling atmosphere of the factory, the noon spell comes with the same benediction and brings the same relief. Men, better than women, understand how to stop when their work is done, securing such ease as they may from a brief interval of repose. In the household few women get the benefit of a real noon spell. If there is a mid-day meal, which they have prepared, when it has been served and eaten there follows the task of clearing it away. To wash the dishes and set them in the closet three times a day is no small undertaking even for a little family. The work of doing this when the family is large is fatiguing enough, yet it is only one little thing in the round of toil that occupies the average woman from daylight until dark. Occasionally one meets a matron who is willing to let her dishes wait a while when the dinner is over, while she, sitting by a window with a book or resting in a hammock, lets sun and air and relaxation do for her what the noon spell does for the men. She is an exception, the rule being with most women to forge ahead as rapidly as possible, until they arrive at the end of the day. They would live longer, be more cheerful and be better comrades on the road if they comprehended the value of short rests in the between-times, and if they made a matter of conscience of an early afternoon rest every day. In a certain family, this privilege of the mother has always been respected, and the children have been trained never to disturb her when she is taking her mid-day recess. Her method is to establish herself in an easy chair with a book or magazine in her hand. Light reading is her choice at this time. As she is fond of a story, she manages to have one somewhere near, so that she need not waste time in looking it up, but very often she finds it better merely to sit with her eyes closed, drifting into a little nap, or, if wakeful, thinking of nothing that taxes her mind. The plan is recommended to women who wish to keep in middle life the sweet freshness and vitality of youth.

The want of a noon spell has a deeper significance and a broader meaning than we give it when we limit it to the actual twenty-four hours of the passing day. In the course of our lives we reach a long level stretch that is far more trying to soul and body than the dewy morning and the quiet evening of childhood and old age. Little as we are by the way of considering it, middle life is beset by peculiar temptations and weighted with peculiar burdens. It is in middle life that parents begin to feel the strain of bringing up the children. They realize suddenly and surprisingly that the babies and the little ones are fast growing into the independence and responsibility of young people, and that correspondingly it costs a good deal in effort and money to clothe them, educate them, and prepare them for the serious engagements of maturity. The middle-aged man walks with a less firm step than that of ten years ago, his shoulders are a little bent, and there are deeper lines on his face. He is bearing the burden and heat of the day. The middle-aged woman, hitherto cheery and buoyant, is tormented by a demon of unrest. She learns for the first time in her experience what it is to be oppressed by monotony. Ennui and languor weave chains around her. In her physical existence she lacks the spring and rebound of an earlier time. She is in want of a noon spell. If it be possible for man or woman at this juncture to secure ever so brief a complete holiday, the good of it will be felt for years to come. Yet, as we all know, many desirable things in this life are neither attainable nor practicable for the majority. We cannot drop our tasks. Others may fold their hands in temporary idleness, but ours must go on performing the daily duties. What are we to do? May we not remember that there is a hard way of going at our work, and that there is an easy way? Is there not a restful attitude of mind that lightens toil and drives away discouragement? Why not cultivate a habit of looking at the bright side, of being glad that it is for our own loved ones that we are working, of being grateful for the shelter of our roof? Why not go a step farther and with Brother Lawrence form the habit of practising the presence of Christ in our commonest tasks? Is it not possible so to carry into every hour of every day, into every word and act, the thought that Christ is with us, that strength shall be ours to carry the burden lightly?

If we cannot obtain an actual noon spell in our middle age, if we may not hope to cross the Atlantic and spend a few weeks in Europe, if we may not see a cessation from the daily grind, it is a good way to accept it all as in the plan and according to the will of our heavenly Father.

There are briars besetting every path
That call for patient care;
There is a cross in every lot
And an earnest need for prayer:
But a lowly heart that leans on God
Is happy anywhere.

Some of the consolations that belong to middle life form a sufficient offset to its peculiar temptations. For one thing, it is an advance out of the primary school into a much higher class. We used to frown over the puzzles of the schoolroom, the mathematics and the geography, but we are beyond that now, and life's higher mathematics, life's fairer geography are now a part of our inheritance. We are past the effervescent period of youth, its ferments and its discontents, and the ships we sent out then, ships of hope, of faith, of love, are surely wending their way across the deep sea, and before long will be coming into port freighted with rich cargoes. There are many better things in this world than money, many more satisfactory things than gratified ambition, and for most of us it is a delight to have lived long enough to know the best way we see it and to choose the best when it is within our reach.

Wanted—a noon spell, of course; but we may get it without buying a ticket on the railway or paying for a passage to Europe; we may find it within our own doors and in the tranquillity of our own home.

Both Sides of the Shield

The question of amusements seems a perplexing one to many conscientious people. Some of us have an idea that all pastimes are wasted times. Others concede that recreation has its place, but we do not approve of certain forms of worldly enjoyment that are popular and agreeable to those less rigid than we are. Old people shake their heads at the diversions of the young. The latter protest that they cannot be fettered by the prejudices of the old. This is a live, up-to-date

CHRISTIAN HERALD topic of thought, and it should awaken a full and frank discussion. Send me your ideas on this subject of legitimate amusements for law-abiding, liberty-loving Christian people. I want to hear from you, and I shall be glad to present candid views of the theories on the Family Page.

Write only on one side of the paper. Fathers, mothers, cousins, sweethearts, friends of every age, write to me and write soon. Among us we shall surely arrive at some helpful conclusions, and as we shall be good-tempered and reasonable, we may make an advance.

Those who can send good suggestions as to game, evening entertainments and sensible social enjoyment will be specially welcome, as, in the future, some definite space will be accorded to this topic.

Concerning Yes and No

When your grandmother was a little girl she was taught to say "Yes, ma'am" and "No, sir," when addressing her father and mother or older people of dignity. Courtly elderly people in some sections of our country still use the formula "Yes, madam," and "Yes, sir," and freely use both madam and sir in polite conversation. These forms are used in talk with equals and superiors.

but not with those of presumably inferior conditions. A friend who dislikes to hear her children say "Yes, ma'am," has compromised by teaching them to say "Yes 'm," "No 'm," which are distinctly slovenly and impure, so far as colloquial English is concerned. "Yes, Mrs. Granger," "No, Dr. Reynolds," have come into vogue, but they are a little cumbersome and it is the hope of some arbiters of good manners that we may yet see a popular return to the stately and good breeding of "Yes, madam," and "No, sir."

If, as you say, a man showed very plainly that he wished further acquaintance, you might have helped him along in some tactful way. A girl need not hesitate to let a man know that he interests her. Read Mr. Crewe's Career, by Winston Churchill (The Macmillan Company), and you will see how daintily and delicately Victoria showed her preference for Austen.

—D. W. R. I am not sure about the book you mention, but an inquiry addressed to the nearest library would give you the information. I advise you to add to your home library, either one by one or as a set, the works of John Fiske (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston). Greene's History of the English People (Harper & Brothers, New York) would be a good investment. Send to the different publishing houses and ask them to mail you their catalogue. You can then make intelligent selection. A home library should be carefully chosen, and be of permanent value to the household.

"He Leadeth Me"

"He leadeth me" not only where
The lanes are decked with flowers fair—
Not only when the skies are blue
And all my friends are leal and true.
But when the thorns and briars meet
To hedge my path and bruise my feet—
When all my skies are clouded o'er
And friends I loved are friends no more.
Tis then by faith I'll closer cling—
By faith a little louder sing—
"He leadeth me"—he knoweth best
The ways which lead to peace and rest.

brutal sacrifices of bird life—the heartless, cruel, inhuman slaughter of feathered songsters and birds of plumage to gratify the vanity of women and swell the purses of the dealers.

Apropos of the recent government agitation on the waste of the country's natural resources, it would be well to reflect for a moment on this needless sacrifice of one of its natural beauties;
the denizens of field and forest, woodland and shore. Is it not appalling to read that whole species of our most beautiful birds are being almost, if not quite, exterminated for the sake of "murderous millinery"? And while the great part of this wealth in plumage comes to us from abroad, we are told that a vast number of birds were shipped not long ago from one State alone in these United States.

Wings no longer suffice, but women must have the whole carcasses of ospreys, birds of paradise, tanagers, hummingbirds, Indian parrots, bobolinks, and a host of others; thousands and thousands of them are bereft of life, year after year, and the figures of a recent invoice for a London consignment are fairly sickening. At an important missionary meeting, both the lady who presided and the missionary describing the cruelties of Indian life, wore aigrettes. Aigrettes—how beautiful! how pitiful! Yet they are among the luxuries most in demand this year.

Every costly spray means the sacrifice of a little mother's life, for these can only be taken from the female bird at the breeding season, when the mother, anxious to protect her young, hovers near the nest. After she is killed, what becomes of the little ones? Their tired, hungry cries grow fainter and fainter until at last they are silenced forever by starvation.

When will the women be shamed out of this unutterably cruel, heartless vanity! Think that but for our feathered neighbors, vegetation would be immeasurably impoverished by destroying insects! Think of summer without the songs in the tree-tops or the love calls of the birds! The question has been agitated for years, and much has been written and many an able plea made by eloquent speakers on the subject, and yet—can anything be really accomplished until the women unite in lifting their voices in one mighty chorus of determination against this awful destruction of life and song?

Can any mother be deaf to the appeal of the mother songsters and the motherless young when the parent's life is taken? Can any tender-hearted girl or right-minded woman be blind to existing conditions? We do not kill the birds with our own hands; we do not command the slayer to go out into the forest and field on his ghastly mission, and the deed is already done, to be sure, before we even see the tempting plume or breast in the shop window. But does not every bit of plumage that has cost an innocent life sanction the taking of another? And truly, as long as women will pay the price, man will do the killing and simply say, "The woman; she tempted me."

Our Shorthand Classes

DURING the summer months, over 500 readers of this journal have taken advantage of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Correspondence Course of Shorthand to acquire a thorough training in the Pitman-Graham system of phonography. The same opportunity will now be extended to all who wish to be enrolled as students for the Correspondence Course during the fall and winter months.

Every State is represented in these classes. Under the very simple system of graded lessons employed, the students are making excellent progress, and their exercises show a uniform proficiency that is very gratifying to both pupils and teacher. Many students, after fairly entering on the Course, have written us expressing their surprise at its simplicity, and at the nominal fee ($1), while the charge for tuition at shorthand schools is from $12 to $20 and upwards.

The Correspondence Course of Shorthand consists of twenty-four lessons by mail, conducted by a Certificated Teacher. They can be taken weekly or semi-weekly as desired. Each lesson is full and self-explanatory. The system is the Standard Pitman-Graham—the most widely used in the business world.
There are weekly reviews and two examinations. The method of instruction is so simple that any intelligent boy or girl, man or woman, can follow it throughout without difficulty. Shorthand is to-day a most valuable part of a business education, and the demand for competent stenographers is increasing every year. This Course, which is arranged specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends, is designed to equip the student for taking a position where mastery of shorthand will be a prime recommendation.

Now is the time to enter for the fall and winter classes. All who desire to qualify for a life vocation, should avail themselves of this liberal offer by sending full name and address with the enrolment fee of one dollar to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House,
New York City. The enrolment fee covers cost of printing, mail and examinations, and there are no extras whatsoever.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend. Margaret investigates the mills and sees many children at work. She informs Frank that she is going to live among them, and he asks if she will stay, saying her presence means everything to one at Belcourt. She thinks he refers to his brother Ned, and says, "No."

EVEN the most urgent entreaties on the part of Margaret failed to start the Spencers on their trip, and not until she herself finally threatened to make the first move and go down to the town, did they consent to go.

"But that absurd house of yours isn't ready yet," protested Mrs. Merideth.

"I know, but I shall stay with Patty until it is," returned Margaret. "I would rather wait until you go, as you seem so worried about the 'break,' as you insist upon calling it; but if you won't, why, I must, that is all. I must be there to superintend matters."

"Then I suppose I shall have to go," moaned Mrs. Merideth, "for I simply will not have you leave us here and go down there to live; and I shall tell everybody, everybody," she added firmly, "that it is merely for the winter, and that we allowed you to do it only on that one condition."

Margaret smiled, but she made no comment—it was enough to fight present battles without trying to win future ones.

On the day the rest of the family left Belcourt, Margaret moved to Patty's little house on the Hill road. Her tiny room under the eaves looked woefully small and inconvenient to eyes that were accustomed to luxurious Belcourt; and the supper—which to Patty was sumptuous in the extravagance she had allowed herself in her visitor's honor—did not tempt her appetite in the least. She told herself, however, that all this was well and good; and she ate the supper and laid herself down upon the hard bed with an exaltation that rendered her oblivious to taste and feeling.

In due time the Mill House, as Margaret called her new home, was ready for occupancy, and the family moved in. Naming the place had given Margaret no little food for thought.

"I want something simple and plain," she had said to Patty; "something that the people will like and feel an interest in. But I don't want any 'Refuges' or 'Havens' or 'Rests' or 'Homes' about it. It is a home, but not the kind that begins with a capital letter. It's just one of the mill houses."

"Well, why don't you call it the 'Mill House,' then, an' done with it?" demanded Patty.

"Patty, you're a genius! I will!" cried Margaret. And the "Mill House" it was from that day.

Margaret's task was not an easy one. Both she and her house were looked upon with suspicion; and she had some trouble in finding the two or three teachers of just the right sort to help her. Even when she had found these teachers, and opened her classes in sewing, cooking and the care of children, only a few enrolled themselves as pupils.

"Never mind," said Margaret, "we shall grow. You'll see!"

The mill people, however, were not the only ones that learned something during the next few months. Margaret herself learned much. She learned that while there were men who purposely idled their time away and drank up their children's hard-earned wages, there were others who tramped the streets in vain search of work.

"I hain't got nothin' ter do yit, Miss," one such said to Margaret, in answer to her sympathetic inquiries. "But thar ain't a boss but what said if I'd got kids I might send 'em along. They was short o' kids. I been tryin' ter keep Rosy an' Katy ter school. I was callin' ter make somethin' of 'em more'n their dad an' their mammy is; but I reckon as how I'll have ter set 'em ter work."

"Oh, but you mustn't," remonstrated Margaret. "That would spoil everything. Don't you see that you mustn't? They must go to school—get an education."

The man gazed at her with dull eyes.

"They got ter eat—first," he said.

"Yes, yes, I know," interposed Margaret, eagerly. "I understand all that, and I'll help about that part. I'll give you money until you get something to do."

A sudden flash came into the man's eyes. His shoulders straightened.

"Thank ye, Miss. We ben't charity folks." And he turned away.

A week later Margaret learned that Rosy and Katy were out of school. When she looked them up she found them at work in the mills.

This matter of the school question was a great puzzle to Margaret. Very early in her efforts she had sought out the public school teachers, and asked their help and advice. She was appalled at the number of children who appeared scarcely to understand that there was such a thing as school. This state of affairs she could not seem to remedy, however, in spite of her earnest efforts. The parents, in most cases, were indifferent, and the children more so. Some of the children in the mills, indeed, were there solely—according to the parents' version—because they could not "get on" in school. Conscious that there must be a school law, Margaret went vigorously to work to find and enforce it. Then, and not until then, did she realize the gravity of even this one phase of the problem she had undertaken to solve.

There were other phases, too. It was not always poverty, Margaret found, that was responsible for setting the children to work. Sometimes it was ambition. There were men who could not even speak the language of their adopted country intelligibly, yet who had ever before them the one end and aim—money. To this one end and aim was sacrificed all the life and strength of whatever was theirs. The minute such a man's boys and girls were big enough and tall enough to be "sworn in" he got the papers and set them to work; and never after that, as long as they could move one dragging little foot after the other, did they cease to pour into the hungry treasury of his hand the pitiful dimes and pennies that represented all they knew of childhood.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE winter passed and the spring came. The Mill House, even to the most skeptical observer, showed signs of being a success. Even already a visible influence had radiated from its shining windows and orderly yard; and the neighboring houses, with their obvious attempt at "slicking up," reminded one of a small boy who has been told to wash his face, for company was coming. The classes boasted a larger attendance, and the stomachs and the babies of many a family in the town were feeling the beneficial results of the lessons.

To Margaret, however, the whole thing seemed hopelessly small; there was so much to do, so little done! She was still the little girl with the teaspoon and the bowl of sand; and the chasm yawned as wide as ever. To tell the truth, Margaret was tired, discouraged, and homesick. For months her strength, time, nerves and sympathies had been taxed to the utmost; and now that there had come a breathing space, when the intricate machinery of her scheme could run for a moment without her hand at the throttle, she was left weak and nerveless. She was, in fact, perilously near a breakdown.

Added to all this she was lonely. More than she would own to herself she missed her friends, her home life at Belcourt, and the tender care and sympathetic interest that had been lavished upon her for so many years. Here she was the head, the strong tower of defense, the one to whom everybody came with troubles, perplexities and griefs. There was no human being to whom she could turn for comfort. They all looked to her. Even Bobby McGinnis, when she saw him at all—which was seldom—treated her with a frigid deference that was inexpressibly annoying to her.

From the Spencers she heard irregularly. Earlier in the winter the letters had been more frequent; nervously anxious epistles of some length from Mrs. Merideth; stilted notes, half protesting, half pleading, from Ned; and short but wonderfully sympathetic communications from Frank. Later Frank had fallen very ill with a fever of some sort, and Mrs. Merideth and Ned had written only hurried little bulletins from the sick room. Then had come the good news that Frank was out of danger, though still far too weak to undertake the long journey home. Their letters showed unmistakably their impatience at the delay, and questioned her as to her health and welfare, but could set no date for their return. Frank, in particular, was disturbed, they said. He had not planned to leave either herself or the mills so long, it being his intention when he went away merely to take a short trip with his sister and brother, and then hurry back to America alone. As for Frank himself—he had not written since his illness.

Margaret was thinking of all this, and was feeling specially forlorn as she sat alone in the little sitting-room at the Mill House one evening in early April. She held a book before her, but she was not reading; and she looked up at once when Patty entered the room.

"I'm sorry ter trouble ye," began

KENTUCKY EXPERIENCE

Coffee and Tea Still at Work.

A Ky. lady had a very agreeable experience, leaving off coffee drinking which she found harmful, and taking on Postum. She never had an opportunity to tell others of her good fortune. She says:

For over 20 years I suffered from nervous trouble. Four years ago I was down with nervous prostration and heart trouble. After several months of misery, my doctor, one of the best in the country, told me I must quit coffee and tea.

What was I to do? I must have some warm beverage for breakfast, as I had never done without one in my life.

I decided to try Postum, little thinking it would amount to anything. At first I did not like it, but when we boiled it 15 minutes, until it was dark and rich, it was delicious, and I soon began to feel better.

After using Postum constantly three years I feel like a different person. I always had been a poor sleeper, but now sleep well and am in perfect health. And I give the credit to Postum.

My entire family now use it in preference to any other beverage at meals. I am an enthusiastic friend of Postum and I know what it has done for me it will do for others, so I never let a chance go by to recommend it to those who suffer from coffee drinking.

Patty, hesitatingly, "but Bobby McGinnis is here and wanted me to ask you—"

Margaret raised an imperious hand. "That's all right, Patty," she said so sharply that Patty opened wide her eyes; "but suppose you just ask Bobby McGinnis to come here to me and ask his question direct. I will see him now." And Patty, wondering vaguely what had come to her gentle-eyed, gentle-voiced mistress—as she insisted upon calling Margaret—fled precipitately.

Two minutes later Bobby McGinnis himself stood tall and straight just inside the door.

"You sent for me?" he asked.

Margaret sprang to her feet. All the pent loneliness of the past weeks and months burst forth in a stinging whip of retort.

"Yes, I sent for you." She paused, but the man did not speak, and in a moment she went on hurriedly, feverishly. "I always send for you—if I see you at all, and yet you know how hard I'm trying to help these people, and that you are the only one here that can help me."

She paused again, and again the man was silent.

"Don't you know what I'm trying to do?" she asked.

"Yes." The lips shut firmly over the single word.

"Didn't I ask you to help me? Didn't I appoint us a committee of two to do the work?" Her voice shook, and her chin trembled like that of a grieved child.

"Yes." Again that strained, almost harsh monosyllable.

Margaret made an impatient gesture.

"Bobby McGinnis, why don't you help me?" she demanded tearfully. "Why do you stand aloof and send to me? Why don't you come to me frankly and freely, and tell me the best way to deal with these people?"

There was no answer. The man had half turned his face so that only his profile showed clean-cut and square-jawed against the close shut door.

"Don't you know that I am alone here—that I have no friends but you and Patty?" she went on tremulously. "Do you think it kind of you to let me struggle along alone like this? Sometimes it seems almost as if you were afraid—"

"I am afraid," cut in a voice shaken with emotion.

"Bobby!" breathed Margaret in surprised dismay, falling back before the fire in the eyes that suddenly turned and flashed straight into hers. "Why, Bobby!"

If the man heard, he did not heed. The bonds of his self-control had snapped, and the torrent of words came with a force that told how great had been the pressure. He had stepped forward as she fell back, and his eyes still blazed into hers.

"I am afraid—I'm afraid of myself," he cried. "I don't dare to trust myself within sight of your dear eyes, or within touch of your dear hands—though all the while I'm hungry for both. Perhaps I do let you send for me, instead of coming of my own free will; but I'm never without the thought of you, and the hope of catching somewhere a glimpse of even your dress. Perhaps I do stand aloof; but many's the night I've walked the street outside, watching the light at your window, and many's the night I've not gone home until dawn lest some harm come to the woman I loved so—what am I saying?" he broke off hoarsely, dropping his face into his hands, and sinking into the chair behind him.

Over by the table Margaret stood silent, motionless, her eyes on the bowed figure of the man before her. Gradually her confused senses were coming into something like order. Slowly her dazed thoughts were taking shape.

It was her own fault. She had brought this thing upon herself. She should have seen—have understood. And now she had caused all this sorrow to this dear friend of her childhood—the little boy who had befriended her when she was alone and hungry and lost. . . . But, after all, why shouldn't he love her? And why shouldn't she—love him? He was good and true and noble, and for years he had loved her—she remembered now their childish compact, and she bitterly reproached herself that she had not thought of it before; it might have saved her this. . . . Still, did she want to save herself this? Was it not, after all, the very best thing that could have happened? Where and how could she do more good in the world than right here with this strong loving heart to help her? She loved him, too—she was sure she did, though she had never realized it before. Doubtless that was half the cause of her present restlessness and unhappiness—she had loved him all the time and did not know it! Surely there was no one in the world who could so wisely help her in her beloved work as Bobby. Of course she loved him!

Very softly Margaret crossed the room and touched the man's shoulder.

"Bobby, I did not understand—I did not know," she said gently. "You won't have to stay away—any more."

"Won't have to—stay—away!" The man was on his feet, incredulous wonder in his eyes.

"No. We—we will do it together—this work."

"But you don't mean—you can't mean—" McGinnis paused, his breath suspended.

"But I do," she answered, the quick red flying to her face. Then, half laughing, half crying, she faltered: "And—and I shouldn't think you'd make—me ask—you!"

"Margaret!" choked the man, as he fell on his knees and caught the girl's two hands to his lips.

CHAPTER XXXIII

NED SPENCER returned alone to Belcourt about the middle of April. In spite of their able corps of managers, the Spencers did not often leave the mills for so long a time without the occasional presence of one or the other of the firm, though Ned frequently declared that the mills were like a clock that winds itself, so admirably adjusted was the intricate machinery of their management.

It was not without some little embarrassment and effort that Ned sought out the Mill House immediately upon his return, and called on Margaret.

"I left Della and Frank to come more slowly," he said, after the greetings were over. "Frank, poor chap, isn't half strong yet, but he was impatient that some one should be here. For that matter, I found things in such fine shape that I told them I was going away again. We made more money when I wasn't round than when I was!"

Margaret smiled, but very faintly. She understood only too well that behind all this lay the reasons why her urgent requests and pleas regarding some of the children had been so ignored in the office of Spencer & Spencer during the last few months. She almost said as much to Ned, but she changed her mind and questioned him about Frank's health and their trip instead.

What There Is in It

The saloon-keepers all may be very nice men,
But what is there in it for me?
I live in my money and wake in the pen,
What is there in it for me?
Of course I'm as welcome as flowers in May
When I come to the joint to squander my pay,
But I wake in the cooler the very next day;
And that's all there's in it for me.

Above this country we're swimming in booze,
What is there in it for me?
The saloon-keeper's kids are wearing new shoes,
What is there in it for me?
The distiller's share is an automobile,
The marriage the retailer's share of the deal,
But I'm wearing shoes that are down at the heel,
And that's all there's in it for me.

My thirst costs me more than my clothes and my food,
And that's all there's in it for me.
The booze took my money and did me no good,
And that's all there's in it for me.
The brewer is rich, he has gold by the peck,
The barman gets paid—he's always on deck—
But whatever I get, I get in the neck—
And that's all there's in it for me.

What should I vote that the curse may endure?
Or what is there in it for me?
I'm bound to vote "dry" on election day sure,
Or what is there in it for me?
We, new self-respect and a chance for my life,
No clothes for the kids and a home for my wife,
The beginning of peace, the end of all strife—
And that's what there's in it for me!"

President of the English Baptists

THIS year's President of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, just entering upon his duties, is the

Rev. Charles Brown

Rev. Charles Brown, of Ferme Park Chapel, London—a comparatively young man, but one who has made his mark as a preacher, and who is rightly regarded as one of the ablest of the Free Church leaders. He belongs to the "old school," that is to say, he is neither a Higher Critic nor a New Theologian. He believes with all his heart in the Bible and its message, and the crowded congregations which bring upon his words in his own church, and wherever he goes to preach, are proof that the man who preaches with faith and heart is always sure of an audience.

His intellectual faculties were first awakened by his Sunday School teacher, a cultivated woman, who opened her house three evenings a week and poured out her fine teaching powers on half a dozen country lads, most of whom bless her memory, and thank God to-day for her wondrous faith and devotion. His spiritual preparation for the ministry came first from his mother. The beautiful building in which Mr. Brown preaches in one of London's northern suburbs is a noble monument to his labors there. There are over a thousand members in full communion with the church.

In an appreciation of Mr. Brown from the pen of the distinguished Birmingham preacher, the Rev. J. H. Swett, M.A., the new president of the Baptist Union is described as "one of those men who by their very presence make us think of God. His light shines, and we see his good works, but we instinctively glorify his Father who is in heaven. A text is not for him a market stall on which he can exhibit motley goods of his own collection; a text is a mine, containing precious ore, and he delves and quarries to bring the buried wealth to the surface. And the beauty of his work is this, that he induces the spectators to become miners, to go and labor in the same rich veins and to return laden with treasure."

An International Temperance Appeal

A COMMITTEE of the International Association of Physicians at Stockholm has just prepared and issued the following appeal. It is entitled "An Appeal by the Physicians of all Lands to all Rulers, Governments, Legislatures, all Educators, Teachers, and Ministers, and all Who Have a Sincere Interest in the Welfare of Our Race and Coming Generations." It proceeds:

"We, who belong to the medical profession and have by study and experience been especially enabled to recognize the true nature and the effects of alcoholic beverages, hereby declare that we are thoroughly convinced that these beverages are altogether unnecessary and in every way injurious, so that we believe the evils arising from the indulgence in intoxicating drinks can and should be eliminated and avoided. Above all, the youth should be taught by precept and example and protected by legal enactments, so that they will abstain from alcoholic liquors. We declare that it is our conviction that this course must be pursued to insure the future sobriety of the race, which is the foundation of its prosperity, welfare and progress."

It is signed by Dr. Holitscher, Pirk-enhammer, Germany; Dr. Santesson, Stockholm, Sweden; Dr. Ridge, Enfield, England; Dr. Stein, Budapest, Hungary; Dr. Vogt, Christiania, Norway; Dr. Laitinen, Helsingfors, Finland; Dr. Olrik, Frederiksvaerk, Denmark.

Jacob Helfrich, of Carrollton, O., for many years a reader of this paper, has been called to his reward in his ninetieth year. He had been a life-long Christian and an active member of the Lutheran Church during his life.

Mrs. S. A. Meek, aged eighty-four, passed to her reward from her home in Knoxville, Tenn. To the last she took an active interest in affairs. She was long a subscriber to this paper and greatly enjoyed the published sermons.

Mrs. Lucy A. Beal departed this life, recently, at her home in East Alstead, N. H., at the age of ninety-two. She was a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for nearly twenty years. She kept young in spirit, and interested in the affairs of her town and of the world generally.

Deacon Benjamin N. Webb, of Riverdale, N. H., passed to his reward December 4, 1907, at the age of eighty-two years. He was a member of the Congregational Church from early manhood. He was for twenty-seven years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and loved it next to the Bible.

Entered into rest Dr. Freeda M. Lankton, of Omaha, Neb. A Christian physician, she spent her life in doing good, healing the sick and seeking the spiritual as well as the physical welfare of those to whom she ministered. She was a staunch friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and gave freely to its many charities and to aid the famine sufferers in India and China. She also supported a missionary and several orphan children in foreign lands. After her death her administrator found on every page of her account book one or more items followed by the words "Given to Christ." Her husband died six years ago, and her life since has been one solely of service.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

The Lord of the Sabbath*

NO FACTS are more firmly established than that the nature of man is threefold, physical, intellectual and spiritual, and that these three natures depend absolutely upon each other. No human being is fully and wholesomely developed who has neglected any one of these parts of himself.

The prize-fighter is too likely to make himself into an ox of strength and to care little for his mind and soul. The scholar is tempted to neglect his body, and not infrequently his soul. The ancient monks and hermits pretended, and not infrequently carried out their pretense, to pay no attention to body or mind, but to devote themselves only to the things of the spirit.

Every one of these classes cherishes a false and imperfect notion of the high office of humanity. We are undoubtedly placed here in order to make the most of the stuff that is in us. In many ways, and especially in the parable of the talents, Christ taught us this great truth. The vast and complicated work of the world—its preparation for the millennium of Christ's universal reign—can be best performed by men equally strong in body, mind and soul. No one of these can be neglected without sin.

In our day men are carrying to almost grotesque lengths the care of the body. Directions for the proper food, the proper exercise, the proper clothing are to be found in every periodical that one picks up. Men choose their homes here or there because their bodily health is likely to be bettered accordingly. They travel or remain at home, they go to bed or get up, they eat or drink, in order to promote health of body.

The care of the mind is also receiving in our age far more attention than ever before. Men do not as yet value the mind as much as the body; but the schools and libraries which are springing up on every side, testify that the life of the intellect is likely to be abundantly fostered during the coming centuries.

But the soul—the spirit of man—the residence of his conscience, the spring whence he draws the living water of heroism, unselfishness, devotion to duty, love of that Highest and Best which we call God—what attention is this receiving in this violently "practical" age? And yet what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world of health and of intellect and lose his own soul?

The Sabbath, with its necessary rest of one day in seven, comes like a benediction to the spiritual nature of man. It is necessary for his body and his mind. It is vitally necessary for his soul and it should be spent with this special end in view—growth in spiritual things. The French Revolutionists thought that one day in ten would suffice to accomplish the purposes of a Sabbath. Read your histories and find out what a bungle they made of it.

Delitsch tells in his latest book most interesting stories of the pillars of stone uncovered during recent excavations on the sites of the great heathen cities of antiquity. On these pillars are tables of moral laws, not unlike our own, some of them containing directions to stop all work on one day in seven and present sacrifices to the gods. The kings of the Gentiles learned early in their history that one day of rest was needed in every seven, for that the world was made in seven days, and that God rested on the seventh day, was a well-nigh universal belief.

Dr. Blaikie calls the Sabbath "the savings bank of human existence"; and Beecher said: "Our Sabbaths should be hills of light and joy in God's presence."

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, September 27. Text: Matt. 12:1-7; Isa. 58:13, 14.

The Cry of the City*

THE preservation of morality among masses of men must early have been found to be difficult. The episode of Sodom and Gomorrah occurs almost at the beginning of Scripture history. Not even ten righteous men could be found there. The sinfulness of Babylon and Nineveh became a proverb. Doubtless all of the great cities of antiquity were almost as bad. Tyre and Sidon were similarly denounced. The prophets agonized over the fate of Damascus and of Tarshish. Our Lord wept over the wickedness of Jerusalem.

Probably Rome at the height of her glory surpassed any other city in the profligacy of her nobles and the corruption and suffering of her slaves. It is recklessly asserted by some of the ancient writers that morality was unknown there. Seneca is authority for the statement that his mother was the only modest woman in the society which they frequented.

This is not to say that there were not many good, pure, true men and women in Rome, as in most of these other cities, even at their worst. Paul's great labors in Rome must have enkindled there a great fire of Christian love and goodness. His disciples were to be found even "in Caesar's household," and surely the doctrine set forth in the epistle to the Romans enjoins upon them the most scrupulous morality. The great commandments were emphatically repeated there and also many of the most affecting portions of the Sermon on the Mount.

In our own country, where no strong central government controls the whole land, but the States manage largely their own affairs, and they, in turn, place the burden of the government of each city chiefly upon itself, the individual citizens carry a heavier responsibility than in other countries. If our city is wicked, it is our own fault. Every man has a hand in the municipal control. If he knows of any reform that should be instituted—anything that ought to be done, he should speak of it. The mayor and his council—the heads of departments—the daily and weekly papers, all of these should be informed. If our cities are bad, we, their citizens, are one and all to blame.

For many years there has been a steady stream of emigration from the country districts to the cities. Young men ambitious to become rich, or eager for amusement and excitement, have left the farms, and have taken up any sort of a position in the city, just for the sake of being there.

Mr. Beecher often deplored this tendency. He was wont to declare that for every one who could succeed in the city, ten men could succeed in the country. In one of his most eloquent outbursts, he said: "I dread nothing more than to hear young men saying, 'I am going to the city.' If they ask me what chances there are for a lawyer in the city, I say, 'Just the chance that a fly has on a spider's web. Go down and be eaten up.' If they ask me what chances there are for a mechanic in the city, I say, 'Good! good! There Death carries on a wholesale and retail business. Coffin-making there is admirable. Men are dying ten times as fast as anywhere else.'"

Beecher was, perhaps, too extreme in his expression; but undoubtedly the strain and expense of average city life are far greater than that of country life. God is working in the hearts of his people in the cities, however, and his missionaries are found in all their borders, carrying into the very slums the light and healing of the Gospel.

THE WAY OUT

From Weakness to Power by Food Ro...

Getting the right start for the day's work often means the difference between doing things in wholesome comfort, or dragging along half dead all day.

There's more in the use of proper food than many people ever dream of—more's the pity. "Three years ago I began working in a general store," writes a man, "and between frequent deliveries and more frequent toilers, I was kept on my feet from morning till night."

"Indigestion had troubled me for some time, and in fact my slight breakfast taken more from habit than appetite. At first this insufficient diet was not noticed much, but at work it made me weak and hungry long before noon."

"Yet a breakfast of rolls, fried foods, coffee meant headache, nausea and kind of discomforts. Either way I was losing weight and strength, when one day a friend suggested that I try a 'Grape-Nuts breakfast.'"

"So I began with some stewed fruit, Grape-Nuts and cream, a soft boiled egg, toast, and a cup of Postum. By noon I was hungry, but with a healthy, normal appetite. The weak languid feeling was not there."

"My head was clearer, nerves steadier for months. To-day my stomach is strong, appetite normal, my bodily power splendid and head always clear."

"There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," 10 pkgs.

Bibles in All Hotel Rooms

Choosing of the Gideons. (Judges 7 ch.)

THE organization known as the Gideons is composed of Christian commercial traveling men. What do they do? They carry the Gospel to the great army of traveling salesmen and incidentally to thousands of others. Where do they go? Into every hamlet, city, town, village, valley, mountain, and plain of the United States. They are one of the largest aggregations of missionaries ever brought together, and exceed in number all the missionaries of all the churches in the United States.

They do not ask financial aid from any church or society outside of themselves. Their mission and work are purely unselfish and they expect no remuneration except that which comes to any life devoted to the Master's service. The Gideons are engaged in a new movement, in which every Christian will be interested. It is estimated there are 400,000 commercial traveling men in the States, a very small per cent. of whom are nominal Christians, while a still smaller number are members of the Gideons. At the last (ninth) convention held in Louisville, Ky., last July, it was determined to make an effort to place in each guest room of every hotel a copy of the Bible.

This is a great task. When we get an idea of the number of hotels in the United States and then estimate the number of guest rooms, we have the quantity of Bibles to be purchased. If hotels prosper, these guest rooms must be occupied frequently. The average hotel room is occupied by the same person but once; thus an average of from twenty to twenty-five different persons occupied each guest room of every hotel every month in the year.

Thousands of this great multitude know little if anything of the power of God's Word. In the quiet of their room, alone with their trials and temptations, they would recall the message of earlier days as they see the Bible in the dresser, and search its pages, while the Holy Spirit does the rest.

"Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel." A hotel is "all the world" in procession, and the Gideons desire to be the conveyers of the Gospel to this procession as their part in spreading the Word. The expense will be large should they try to do this work as they do every other work they undertake. They are expecting the cooperation of all classes of people. Pastors and churches who appreciate the need of Bibles in hotels in their towns and cities, can apply to the Gideons for this purpose. For this purpose the Gideons will invite outside aid. They will contract for the Bibles in quantities, and binding and style will be in proper accord with the environment into which they are to be placed and will bear the stamp of the Gideon organization.

The national headquarters of the Gideons are at 17 Quincy Street, Room 601 Baltimore Building, Chicago. F. A. Garlick is National Secretary.

God's Judgment on Sin

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN the Almighty God pronounces "woe," then it is woe indeed, even as when he says "blessed," he has the power to bless. After the lamentations of the prophet Isaiah over the grievous degeneracy of God's people in his day, he speaks immediately of "the latter days." He sees the future glory of Israel; but he sees also God's judgment, the time of the "great tribulation." Looking with a prophet's eye on the present and on the future, he says, "Say ye to the righteous that it shall be well with him; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe unto the wicked, for it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him."

What is it that has brought about the desolation of Israel? Six sins are mentioned, which all have their root in selfishness: "We have turned every one to his own way," and one of them, drunkenness, is twice named. The first is covetousness. This sin is as strong amongst God's ancient people now as in Isaiah's time; but it is not peculiar to the Jews. How many so-called Christians join house to house, shop to shop, factory to factory, utterly regardless of how it may affect their struggling neighbors! The principle of "Live and let live" has died out, and the combinations of the rich capitalist to tread others down out of the market, and to get a monopoly, and the modern combines and trusts, ruin thousands who do business in a small way. "Might is right" is the principle on which they go, but this is not to be found in the Word of the living God; it is the principle which will govern the "man of sin" and his adherents in the last days. And these men of gigantic covetousness, who tread under foot the command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," are unconsciously making the way for the great Antichrist. The terrible thing is that many of them are professing Christians, and yet utterly asleep to the woe which has gone out from God against them.

The same lust of the flesh which makes the covetous man the despicable being that he is, makes the slave of drink to be equally the dupe of Satan, the laughing-stock of the thoughtless, the pity of the compassionate. How many boast of their strength of nerve and will, and declare that they can stop when they like, and they do not see that the coils of the python are winding themselves around them, and that they are slaves already. It is a dangerous thing for himself when a young man tampers with strong drink, and it may lead to the death of others who may follow his example, even if he should escape. The question for the Christian is not "Will the taking of stimulants harm me?" A higher motive belongs to one who, as a new creature in Christ Jesus, lives no more unto himself. The question with him is, "Can I serve and honor my God, and can I serve my fellow creatures most by taking stimulants or by abstaining from them?" There can be but one answer. God here draws a terrible picture of the consequences of strong drink: "My people are gone into captivity." Take it in the lowest sense, and search the prisons in our own land, how many are there through drink? Some tell us nine in every ten. "Their honorable men are famished, and their multitude parched with thirst." Until God lays hold of a drunkard, all his misery does not bring him down; he will excuse himself to the very last, deny his sin, or justify himself.

"Where can I invest my money so that it will be safe and where I can have it returned, and yet so it will bring me reasonable earnings when invested?" This question will be answered to your satisfaction if you will write the Industrial Savings & Loan Co., whose advertisement appears on page 736.

LINCOLN'S EXAMPLE OF SELF-HELP. No one ever had fewer opportunities of acquiring an education than Abraham Lincoln; nobody ever made better use of such as he possessed. In his youth he would walk miles to borrow a book from which he might glean a little knowledge of the world. What a treasure—what an inexhaustible treasure would this Encyclopedia have been to him! The lesson which such a life as Lincoln's teaches is that knowledge and mental training can be won under the most adverse circumstances; and if that is so, who can say that any path is barred to him by lack of opportunity when there lies within his reach such means of advancement as are afforded by this magnificent work?

A PARENT'S DUTY is to give his children the best education that his means will afford. You may not be able to send your children to college, perhaps not even to high school; but you can afford this Encyclopedia. It will influence their future as you would wish. It will help them grow in character, refinement and knowledge.

EVERYONE CAN AFFORD IT. It will cost you only a few cents a day for a little while to become the possessor of this work. Even if your circumstances deny you the luxuries of life, just think of some little thing—some little habit which brings you no ultimate good—which you might give up, and so obtain this work which means so much to you and your possibilities in life. You pay only a little and only for a little while, and during that time the work is in your possession.

DO NOT DELAY—CUT OUT AND MAIL THE COUPON TO-DAY, if you wish to secure the most wonderful book bargain of this generation. The sets will fairly melt away at these phenomenal prices, and in order to secure one you must act at once. You can never duplicate this opportunity.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

A Sunny Morning Hour at the Window Garden

Superb Photogravures FREE

To Our Regular Subscribers and Members of Their Immediate Families

These photogravures, all mounted and ready for framing, measure 10 x 15 Inches, and could not be purchased at any art store for less than $1.00 for the set. The exquisite tone-values—that are only made possible by the costly photogravure process—the rare beauty of the subjects which we have chosen, the soft richness and velvet texture of these reproductions make every picture worth framing and hanging in any parlor or library.

MINIATURE REPRODUCTION

"EVA," by Edward Cabane, makes an instantaneous appeal. It shows a truly adorable child of seven, seated in a chair, with dark wistful eyes gazing out from under a mass of curly hair—a picture that is, in short, one of those rare works of art that "satisfies."

MINIATURE REPRODUCTION

"RETURNING TO THE FOLD," by Davis, is a delightful pastoral scene, showing the familiar flock of sheep with the shepherd and faithful dogs, yet so wonderfully is the subject handled in this instance that it is lifted far out of the ordinary and is indeed one of those pictures that the more we see the more we love.

MINIATURE REPRODUCTION

"WILD ROSES," by Morgan, is an altogether charming presentation of nature and child life. It is hard to describe this picture, yet there is something about it that never fails to hold both heart and eye of even the sternest critic.

WHAT WE ARE STRIVING FOR

WE have in preparation the most artistic HOLIDAY CIRCULAR ever issued by us, Superbly Illustrated in Beautiful Colors, and which, of course, we send to all of our regular subscribers as soon as issued. But as we are just now straining every effort in an aggressive campaign to greatly enlarge our Subscription List, we have printed a million extra copies of this circular, hoping with them to reach and influence people who ought to be subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but are not now on our list. THEREFORE:

To every member of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD FAMILY who will send us a list of 25 Names in accordance with the conditions imposed by our SPECIAL OFFER—for which see below—together with ten cents in coin or stamps to cover the cost of postage and handling, we will deliver a set of the exquisite intaglio photogravures of which we give miniature reproductions above. There is no further expense attached to this offer, and we guarantee to deliver the pictures securely packed, uncreased and in perfect condition.

Nain in Autumn, with the Dreaded Arctic Winter Near

Mr. Schmitt Ready for a Journey

Nain, Labrador, in July, when the Ice Leaves the Coast

IN PERIL AMID ARCTIC ICE FLOES

By CHRISTIAN SCHMITT

Of Nain, Labrador

WHEN I wrote you last year, I think I mentioned that I was detained at Cape Chidley nearly the whole summer, through an accident to our mission ship Harmony. Finally, I barely reached Nain (about the 10th of November) before new ice closed all navigation.

I have been very pleased with the new sleigh which your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers provided for my work. I find it much superior to any of the sleighs here; it is so very light, and by virtue of this and the wide shoes, it does not sink into the snow, like our local sleighs. On this account we are able to travel much faster, which is of considerable importance in these regions, where winter days are very short. Beside these practical advantages, the new sleigh is much more comfortable, and traveling with it is now a pleasure. Kindly accept my heartiest thanks for this generous gift, and express the same to your readers, who so generously interceded themselves in it.

Ice and snow have once more departed and our coast is sufficiently clear to permit ships to arrive and letters to be sent and received. What a world it is that opens to us again, after the long winter months! News pours in from all quarters, and after glancing through letters and papers, we are thankful that so many dear friends are still among the living.

Only a few days ago, we heard of the narrow escape Dr. Grenfell had on the ice this spring. It reminds us of dangers encountered here. Some of our experiences may be of interest to your readers.

During the long winter months, while our coast is icebound (from November till June), our Eskimos go out to the ice's edge (out into the open sea and away from the islands). Here the ice breaks off frequently and in the expanse of open water thus caused the Eskimo is able to hunt the seal, walrus and polar bear. While hunting, they mostly have a permanent dwelling on an outside island, from which their operations take place to North, East or South with sledge and dogs. The ice in these quarters is anything but stationary, and after each gale of wind which latter are very frequent in winter—some change may take place. Any gale may cause a ground swell, which is always much feared, as it makes the firm ice break up. Huge pieces of floe-ice drift, sometimes closely packed and even shoved on top of each other, sometimes loosely floating in the water; but these soon freeze up together again, making once more a solid but very uneven mass of ice. This more or less shifting, heaving, changing mass of ice and sea is, during the winter months, the hunting ground of our people.

While I was visiting these people in March, last winter, two men, Boas Tullak and Tobias Maggo, left early one morning to go out on the ice walrus hunting. The weather was fine and clear and, as the ice floes were far apart, some new ice and patches of open water were found between them. The danger, however, that threatened was the thinness of the new ice. It was only two days old and would hardly bear the weight of dogs, sleds and men. But the chances were good for a hunt, as the new ice just suited the great monster walrus. He could without trouble poke his nose through any-ago the hole was made. In the distance, a huge bull walrus had swung himself on to the big pan of ice and was sunning himself; but to get near enough for a shot was almost impossible on an open expanse and without a screen of iceberg or big floe ice. The signs were good in the nearest vicinity, so the walrus on the pan was not molested. Yet it was difficult to get near enough to a walrus for a thrust with the harpoon.

Late in the afternoon, Boas, after waiting for more than an hour at a likely place, darted forth his harpoon with all his might and buried it deep in the chest of the surprised and enraged animal. The further end of the skin line attached to the harpoon was speedily made fast to the nearest sound piece of ice, and both Boas and Tobias held on to this for dear life. The animal was duly killed, for, when it came to the surface again to breathe, it had lost much blood and was considerably weakened. It was then dispatched by either gun or harpoon, quartered, and the meat, fat and skin duly deposited on the nearest pan of sound ice.

Meanwhile, night had set in, the days being yet very short, and the hunters had to be quick and get back to sledge and dogs in order to reach home the same night. The booty was left behind to be brought forward, however, the following day, as it was unsafe to travel with a loaded sledge and at night on thin ice. The men often spend a night on the ice, or build a snow house, if sufficient hard snow can be found for the purpose; but this time, by careful navigation and the light of a new moon, they reached home over the thin ice in safety.

I happened to be paying them a visit at the time. The small settlement consists only of five families, but how glad they were to be visited by their missionary! A man and a child were very sick. Others were recovering from a severe attack of influenza and these were thankful for the advice and medicine I was able to give. We had services together, and when one remembers that only once in a while the Gospel is heard by these hearty natives, one is only too glad to give his best for their spiritual nourishment.

One bright little girl of nine years busied herself with her letters and pencil, and with her mother's help is now able to read and write fairly well. The recent hunt, however, and the success attending it were uppermost in their thoughts. Not always is a hunt attended with so little difficulty, and the hairbreadth escapes, when the ice is driven out to sea by where, take a supply of fresh air into his lungs, and dive again for half an hour or twenty minutes, when he would have to come up again for a fresh supply.

Boas and Tobias, after they arrived at the hunting ground proper, made fast their dogs to a pan of ice and left all but guns and harpoons behind them. They now advanced cautiously over the new ice, avoiding the places where it was too thin. Sure enough, they soon found that walrus were at hand. Here and there one could see the holes in the thin ice, which the animals had made, and by closely examining the small bits of ice thus ejected to the surface, Boas could tell exactly how many hours

Gifts and Grace

TEXT:

"But covet earnestly the best gifts. And yet show I unto you a more excellent way." I. Cor. 12:31.
"Follow after love." I. Cor. 14:1 (R.V.)

THE attention of the Christian Church is being strongly directed at this time to the special gifts of the Spirit, and it is well that we should consider carefully and soberly the teachings of the Holy Scriptures on this important subject. It occupies a prominent and large place in this manual of the church, the first epistle of Paul to the Corinthians, almost three whole chapters being devoted to its discussion.

First of all let us carefully remember that the gifts of the Spirit here defined are quite distinct from the grace of the Spirit, and that our possession of these gifts does not affect our personal salvation and sanctification and our standing with God as subjects of his grace. This is quite apart from the Holy Spirit's ministry in leading us to Christ for salvation and in bringing us into union with him through consecration and the baptism of the Holy Ghost. The most pernicious error abroad today in connection with these gifts is to make them a necessary test of our having received the Holy Ghost, and come into the fulness of Christ.

Gifts of the Holy Spirit

The following points are clear and important in connection with the teaching of the apostle regarding the charismata or gifts of the Spirit:

1. The apostle distinguishes gifts, ministries and operations of the Spirit (vs. 4-6). By the gifts he means the special power communicated to the believer through the Holy Ghost for some special ministry. By the word administration he means the use of that gift in some actual ministry or form of service. And by the word operations he means the inward workings of the Holy Ghost in our individual experience as we receive this gift and exercise this ministry. It brings a corresponding experience to the heart as well as a more effective ministry to the life. We are not cold and passive instruments in the hands of the Master, but warm, living, responsive co-workers with him, receiving in our own hearts the blessing which we are used in imparting to others. Now there are diversities of these gifts, ministries and experiences, but it is the one Spirit that works in every case. We are taught, therefore, at the beginning not to attempt to copy anyone, but remember that God has a different method with every individual.

2. Every disciple of Christ ought to have some special manifestation of the Holy Ghost and some gift for Christian service. "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal" (v. 7). There is no place for idlers and drones, and there is no excuse for the fruitless Christian. God has power and work for all who will yield themselves to him for his service and glory.

Gifts Are of Many Varieties

3. These gifts are conferred by the Holy Ghost himself in his sovereign will according to individual fitness and for the completeness and profit of the whole body of Christ. He knows the gift that will best enable us to glorify him and help others. No disciple can expect to receive all these gifts. It is preposterous to say that the gift of tongues, for example, is the criterion of having received the Holy Ghost. The apostle distinctly asks, "Have all the gift of tongues?" God adjusts our equipment to our natural temperament and ability, to our providential circumstances and to the special work which he has called us to do. We are represented here as various members of the body of Christ, and as in the body the different members have different offices, so is it in the body of Christ. The apostle asks with graphic force, "If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing where were the smelling?" It is easy to make the figure still more vivid. Suppose a human face was all nose, or all ears, it would be a monstrosity. And suppose it were all tongue, and especially a foreign tongue, it would neither be attractive nor useful. Our business is to yield ourselves to the Holy Spirit for such gifts and ministries as he has for us, and trust him for the endowment and the enabling.

4. The particular gifts of the Spirit are next specified. There are nine of them altogether. The first is the gift of wisdom. Wisdom is that quality which enables us to do the right thing and to avoid the wrong thing. It is the helm of life. Like salt in the natural world, often imperceptible and seemingly of little consequence, but absolutely necessary to life and health, so wisdom pervades every other quality and ministry, and rightly holds the first place as the pre-eminent gift of the Holy Ghost. We are very apt to overlook this quality in our search for the more brilliant and extraordinary manifestations of the Spirit, and the lack of wisdom often leads to the abuse of the very things we desire.

The second gift is knowledge. This is the knowledge of the truth, and especially the Word of God. Here it is spoken of as the word of wisdom. It is not a general stock of crystallized knowledge laid up by mere human study, but it is a particular revelation as we need to use the word for each occasion and service. "I have put my words into thy mouth," he says, "and covered thee with the shadow of my hand." "The Lord hath given me the tongue of one that hath learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary. He wakeneth morning by morning. He wakeneth mine ear to hear as one that has learned."

The next gift is the gift of faith. It is not saving faith, faith that justifies, sanctifies and brings to us every supply of divine grace, but it is the special faith which fits us for effectual service; the faith that removes mountains of difficulty, the faith that uproots sycamore trees of evil, the faith that knocks until doors are opened, the faith which equips the evangelist for the winning of souls and the worker for the accomplishing of great and mighty things in the pulling down of strongholds and the building up of the kingdom of God. No gift of the Holy Spirit is of more unspeakable value than the gift of faith. It was of this the Master said to his disciples, when they asked him the secret of his own power, "Have the faith of God."

Gifts of Healing

Following this come the gifts of healing. This does not mean some magic or magnetic power possessed by some individuals, enabling them to remove disease by a touch, but at the same time a very real power to help God's sick and suffering children to know and receive him as their healer and life. Just as God gives to some the special ministry of leading souls to Christ, so he gives to others as distinct a ministry in leading sufferers to receive the healing power of the Great Physician. And in these days of divine manifestation, when God has been for some years calling marked attention to the physical aspects of redemption, it is surely a time when we should call upon God for a mighty revival of the ministry of healing, and a distinct endowment of the workers who are called to it with the faith and power of God, even as in the days of old.

Next follows the working of miracles. These are distinguished from the gifts of healing, inasmuch as healing is not always or even usually miraculous, but rather on lines which, while distinctly supernatural, are more quiet, normal and even gradual. There are cases of miraculous healing, but there are many more in which the subject is led to receive the life of the Lord Jesus in a simpler way as the very element of his being and the habit of his whole life. The miracle is rather intended by its sudden and startling character to attract public attention, and to bear witness in some extraordinary way to the power and majesty of God. There is no doubt that the miraculous is an element of the Spirit's endowment, and there is no reason why it should ever have ceased in the history of the church. But here again we are not to be watching for the wonderful, but rather seeking the useful and helpful, and leaving it to God himself in his sovereign will to work miraculously when it pleases and glorifies him.

The sixth of these gifts is prophecy. Ordinarily we associate this gift with the foretelling of future events. The Scriptural idea of it is different. It is rather a divine inspiration enabling the possessor to speak direct messages of the Holy Spirit for the spiritual profit of the hearer. "He that prophesieth speaketh unto men to edification and exhortation and comfort." All preaching ought to be to a certain extent prophetic in the sense of being God's immediate message to the hearer. This differs from the unfolding of the Scriptures and the teaching of doctrine. The prophetic message has more immediate reference to the particular condition of the hearer and the need of immediate spiritual help. This gift the apostle emphasizes above all the others as the one most useful and helpful. "Follow after love and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy."

The next gift is the discerning of spirits. It is quite remarkable that this gift immediately precedes the last two; namely, tongues and interpretation of tongues. It would seem as if at this point there were peculiar need for the power to distinguish the false and the true. The gift of tongues above all others opened the way for scenes of rich excitement and the possibility of Satanic counterfeits. There are languages spoken in hell as well as in heaven, and God himself has forewarned us to "try the spirits whether they be of God, for many false prophets have gone forth into the world."

If God is really speaking he will not be impatient with us in our earnest desire to make sure it is his voice. There are several tests to which we all allude later by which we may discriminate between the false and the true and regulate the public worship of God's assemblies.

Special Manifestations

Next comes the gift of tongues. There is no doubt that this was one of the special manifestations of the Holy Ghost in the apostolic church. It appears to have been specially prominent in the church at Corinth, and perhaps to have been cultivated and sought to an extreme degree by that people who were not noted for the very deepest spiritual life. There is always danger in unduly seeking the occult, mysterious and demonstrative. It is in this line that the adversary manifests his power through clairvoyance and spiritualism. But there was no doubt of the divine reality of many of the extraordinary manifestations, nor is there any reason why this gift should not appear at any time in the history of the church, and especially in the last days when we may expect the most remarkable outpourings of the Holy Ghost. It appears to have been a divine ecstasy, which lifted the soul above the ordinary modes and expressions of reason and utterance. As a profound German scholar expresses it, "Man contains three elements in his higher constitution; namely, the pneuma, the nous and the logos." That is, the spirit, the mind and the language. The spirit is the higher element and in the gift of tongues appeared to overleap the mind altogether and find its expression in speech, quite intelligible to the person himself and yet truly expressing the higher thought and feeling of the exalted spiritual state of the subject. It may be a human tongue, or it may be a heavenly tongue. In the apostle distinctly speaks of both the tongues of men and of angels. It was not always employed in the apostolic church as the vehicle of preaching to people of other languages, but rather was a channel of direct worship and adoration. "He that prophesieth speaketh unto men, but he that speaketh in an unknown tongue speaketh not unto men but unto God."

Finally, the gift of interpretation was the power to understand and translate the language spoken in the Spirit. It might more correctly be called the gift of translation. Sometimes it was possessed by the speaker himself, sometimes by another who gave the translation. Therefore the apostle says, "If ye have him that speaketh in an unknown tongue pray that he may interpret."

The Apostolic Command

5. The relative importance and value of the various gifts is next brought out with great clearness. They are named in a certain order in the various places where we find them specified; and this order is practically uniform. In every instance the gift of tongues comes at the end of the list, and the gifts of wisdom, knowledge, faith and prophecy take precedence. In the most practical way the apostle commends the things that edify and help compared with those that directly bless and honor the individual worshiper. He does not ignore the gift of tongues by any means, but recognizes it as the distinct mark of the divine power and presence and a very glorious and blessed channel of direct fellowship with the heavenly world, and in so sense a real opening of the doors between the earthly and the heavenly. But he adds with evident point, "Wherefore covet to prophesy and forbid not to speak with tongues." "Forasmuch as ye are zealous of spiritual gifts, seek that ye may excel to the edification of the church."

6. The spirit of decorum, propriety and order are next emphasized with great fulness. "Let all things be done decently and in order."

THE FOURTH ESPERANTO CONGRESS

NOTHING could have been more encouraging to Esperantists than the success of their fourth Congress held in Dresden, Germany, recently. There were 200 more delegates present than last year at Cambridge, or 1,600 altogether, representing forty-one different nationalities. Friedrich August III., King of Saxony, was the "Protector" of the Congress, and all the chief ministers and officials of the country were honorary members of the Committee on Organization. The city of Dresden generously helped in the organization of the Convention, and its Mayor as well as the King's Chief Councilor, heartily congratulated the great audience.

The United States and Japan both sent official delegates to the Convention. The effect of this has been to show to Europe the interest taken in Esperanto by the officials of these powerful countries. Major Straub, the American delegate, sent by the Secretary of War, was deeply interested in all he saw and especially in the Esperanto movement among the Red Cross Societies and among military officers. The Central Red Cross Committee of Geneva and the International Peace Bureau of Berne also sent official representatives.

The Lingva Komitato, the central linguistic authority, established by request of Dr. Zamenhof and composed of the world's ablest Esperantists, has elected from its members an academy of sixteen, with four departments, which will from now on take up the study of all linguistic questions and direct the preparation of technical vocabularies for the new language. The head of the Academy is Dr. Emile Boirac, President of the University of Dijon, and the four chiefs of departments are: Prof. Th. Cart, Dr. Grabovsky, Gaston Moch and René de Saussure. The well-known writer Kabe was elected Vice-President.

elers, and the starting of Esperanto Homes.

Having extensively discussed the question of teaching and diplomas, the Congress officially approved the foundation of the International Institute of Esperanto, started in New York and Paris last winter, and delegated to it the task of organizing normal schools for Esperanto teachers and examinations, with international diploma.

It has been decided to hold two congresses in 1909 at different dates, the first in the United States at Chautauqua during the third week of August, and the other in Spain in spring or in autumn. The principal Esperanto leaders will attend both.

The Bible translators who are engaged in producing the Esperanto Scriptures met and discussed the first number of their special paper, in which appears, page after page, the definitive Esperanto text of God's Word. Rev. Dr. Kuehn of Dresden, the Sunday before the Congress met, preached in the Lutheran church in Dresden in Esperanto, and in the Catholic church Abbe Pichot did likewise.

At the opening of the Congress all greeted the genial and modest Zamenhof—Japanese, Americans, Russians, French, Germans, Siberians, joining in the tribute of esteem. It was a memorable sight to see the great throng of different nationalities singing "La Espero" together, listening to the delegates speaking one harmonious language, and forgetting for the time all differences of race and of condition.

We have just one year to prepare for the Fifth Universal Congress and to bring to Chautauqua in August, 1909, two thousand Americans to greet Dr. Zamenhof and our European friends who are coming to see us. Let us all get busy and go to work with courage.

done decently and in order," he admonishes. "If any man speak in an unknown tongue, let it be by two or at the most by three, and that by course, and let one translate; but if there be no translator, let him keep silence in the church and let him speak to himself and to God." "If anything be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace, for ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn and all may be comforted. For God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all the churches of the saints."

Then he unfolds a principle of the profoundest importance, "The spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." The Holy Spirit does not carry us away in wild, irrational extravagance, but holds his communications subject to our sanctified judgment, and the order and edification of the whole assembly. It is the spirit of evil that rushes us and drives us to the excesses that bring dishonor and contempt upon the work and worship of God. How much cause we have to thank God for these wise and holy cautions and counsels! Let us be willing to heed and follow.

7. The pre-eminence of love. Above all gifts, above all ministries is the grace of love, that love that uses every gift and ministry, not to exploit its own greatness, but to glorify God and bless men. Not only is love here described as an end, but as a means. He says, "I show unto you a more excellent way," which is the way to reach the highest gifts of the Spirit. God will entrust to us his most sacred ministries and most glorious manifestations in proportion as he sees that we will use them in the spirit of love and for the help of the souls that are so dear to the Shepherd's heart.

In conclusion.

1. Let us not fear or ignore any of the gifts and manifestations of the Holy Ghost, no matter how extraordinary; but be prepared to expect God to reveal himself to his people, especially in these last days, in many signal and glorious ways.

2. At the same time let us not fear to exercise the spirit of discernment and to take ample time and measures to be sure that any alleged work bears the signs of God's approval and control. Let us especially watch lest even good movements become mixed with evil through the lack of discernment or carefulness. Let us not be afraid to exercise proper supervision and control in the Spirit over religious assemblies. And especially let us endeavor to keep these remarkable and supernatural manifestations of the Spirit from being handed over to unwise and reckless leaders and persons of doubtful character or spiritual qualifications.

3. Again, let us not confuse the gifts and the graces of the Spirit. The work of the Holy Ghost in saving and sanctifying is entirely distinct from these special gifts. To say that the gift of tongues is the only proper evidence of having been baptized with the Holy Ghost is rash and wholly unscriptural, and places a mere manifestation of the Holy Ghost above his higher ministry of grace. Love, which is simply a grace of the Spirit, is placed above any of the gifts, and this love will surely keep us from judging one another.

4. Again, let us covet earnestly the best gifts, but chiefly the gifts of useful and effectual spiritual ministry.

5. Let us set ourselves against disorder, excess and extravagance, even though we may be criticized and denounced for hindering and quenching the Spirit. The Spirit himself has given to us these divine tests and directions by which we may discriminate and direct. We are therefore obeying him when we firmly yet kindly insist that the assembly of Christ's people shall be characterized by order, propriety, decorum, consideration for one another, and especially the spirit of edification, usefulness and helpfulness.

6. Finally, let us pray for love, let us cultivate love, let us take the Lord Jesus himself to be our love, and let our deepest cry be

Give me a heart like thine.

In the beautiful poem of Sir Launfal, a Christian knight had gone forth with holy zeal in quest of that which represented in that age the most glorious gift of God. It was the Holy Grail, the identical cup from which the Lord Jesus and his disciples had drunk the sacred draught "on that night in which he was betrayed." As he passed out from the palace gate, a loathsome leper stretched out his festering hands for help, and begged him to take the filthy cup that was lying beside him, and bring him a drink of water from the flowing brook. But the knight waved him aside and swept on, for he was after higher things.

Years passed by, as he pursued in vain his weary quest over many lands and under scorching suns. His body was worn, his hair was gray, his heart was broken, his hopes had almost died. A worn-out wreck, he was slowly returning to his home with a crushed and disappointed heart, when once again a leper met him on the way and stretched out the same festering hands for the same loving ministry. Swiftly the knight leaped from his horse, picked up the repulsive vessel, and hastening to the stream, with profoundest courtesy and tenderest sympathy he handed to the sufferer the drink he had requested. In a moment the scene was changed, and the transfixed leper had become none other than the Son of Man himself. The light of heaven shone around him and the filthy cup became transformed into a shining vessel of silver; and as the Master handed it back to him it was indeed the "Holy Grail"! Yes, he had learned the "more excellent way," and the ministry of love had brought the gifts of power and glory which otherwise he had sought in vain. So still we shall find that "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted" and he that would stand nearest to the Son of Man must, like him, also come "not to be ministered unto, but to minister," and to give up his very life as a living sacrifice of love.

Though I speak with tongues of mortals, or of seraphim above,
I am but a tinkling cymbal if I have not Love!
Though I reach the heights of knowledge: every mystery though I prove:
I am nothing, less than nothing, if I have not Love!
Though I give with princely bounty: yield my life my zeal to prove:
Vain are all my gifts and sufferings if I have not Love.
Blessed, gentle, holy Jesus, blessed, holy, heavenly Dove
Give to me the Master's spirit, fill my heart with Love.

OCEAN GROVE'S CAMP MEETING

The Greatest in its History, it Concludes with the Old-Fashioned Love-Feast

The Old Well at the Grove

Bishop L. B. Wilson

Rev. Dr. J. H. Alday

The Temple, Ocean Grove

OCEAN GROVE'S Camp Meeting, which commenced August 28 and closed September 7, was one of the best in its history. All pronounced it "an old-fashioned camp meeting" where Jesus was in the midst. The meetings were full of the power of the Holy Ghost.

This Camp Meeting is a departure from the old tent life in the woods; but a few tents still surround the Auditorium, reminding one of the days of yore.

The Camp Meeting opened with a consecration service, led by Rev. Dr. A. E. Ballard, followed by the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in the Auditorium. The first Sabbath, Rev. Dr. Goodell, of New York, preached in the morning, and in the evening Commander Maud Ballington Booth spoke. The daily meetings were: Consecration, 5:45 A.M. and 6:45; Family Prayer at the Auditorium; Fellowship Meeting in Thornley Chapel 9 A.M., led by Miss Elizabeth Sharp; Holiness Meeting, Tabernacle, led by Rev. Dr. Alday, at 9 A.M., Rev. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, President of the Ocean Grove Association, being the only speaker. This service was always crowded. Bishop Wilson is a type of the late Alfred Cookman, of precious memory, and many declared that they could almost believe they had heard the voice of the well-beloved Cookman in the tones of Bishop Wilson. This is one of his utterances: "I would rather study Paul's description of a holy man, and make him my model, than listen to the most eloquent sermon from the most gifted lips." At one meeting he spoke on the words: "Keep yourselves in the love of God," and emphasized the fact that we have our part to do in the spiritual life. We must follow God's programme if we are to come out in the place God has for us. Exercising faith and having a glorious life must depend upon whether our prayers are joined to the Holy Ghost, and we are under his guidance. The bishop continued: "I cannot be just the same man to-morrow as I am to-day. Progress is necessary in the divine life. If you plead that you are weak and impotent this will not relieve you of the responsibility. God meets those who keep themselves in the love of God. If you do this then he is able to keep you from falling."

Rev. Dr. W. H. Morgan led the crowded Young People's Meeting in the Temple. This leader has been most successful, and is full of zeal, holding, in addition, two men's meetings on Sunday, where much personal work was done. Mrs. Elizabeth Smith held a large "Decision Meeting" in the Tabernacle, where many made confession of Christ. Amanda Smith, the colored evangelist, was one of the efficient helpers by song and testimony.

Bishop Wilson led the Pentecostal Meeting, where many wonderful testimonies were given of God's power to save and keep from sin. The Twilight Meeting was in charge of Miss Helen Gertrude Rumsey, and attracted many young people. A Beach Meeting, led by Dr. Ballard, was held every day, and was well attended. The Sunday services, with Rev. Dr. Munhall's Bible Class, in the Auditorium, had an attendance of about four thousand people. Mr. Hudson, Superintendent of Sunday School, reports the largest attendance in the history of the Grove. The "Children's Hour" was in the care of Mrs. Hudson, who has much talent with young folks. On Sunday, Dr. W. I. Boswell, of the Church Extension Society, Philadelphia, led the services, and at least fifty children confessed Christ.

The last Sunday of the Camp Meeting dawned with a clouded sky and much rain, but it did not dampen the ardor of the people. Long before 9 o'clock the Auditorium was well filled. Bishop Wilson urged that the testimonies be brief to give everyone a chance. Some quoted a text of Scripture, some sang a verse of a hymn, then another would sing "Jesus all the day long was my joy and my song." There were shouts of victory all over the camp and often several persons speaking at the same time. A young woman in the gallery sang with a clear voice, "You may look for me, I'll be there;" then some one started "Beulah Land," and another followed with: "Well, the delightful day spoke with great earnestness. Dr. W. I. Boswell, a revival leader, gave account of some conversions he had known, including his own. He invited seekers for pardon to come forward to the altar, a thirty or forty responded. Soon the shout of victory was heard as one after another testified "Jesus has pardoned my sins." The meeting was dismissed by Bishop Wilson at 10:30 P.M., but the people lingered. It was a glorious day of blessing. At late hour, groups were singing around some happy soul: "I do believe, that Jesus saves me now."

On Monday morning, September 7, the Camp Meeting came to a close at nine o'clock. The front seats were filled with children to be baptized. It was a lovely sight—parents presenting their little ones to Jesus. Then followed two resolutions which were presented and passed by the congregation. The first related to the Bishop's Law, and commended the work of Governor Fort in behalf of temperance. The second was in regard to the proposed Ocean Boulevard.

Mr. Tali Esen Morgan has been indefatigable in all the revival services, and the great organ, to has been a potent factor in worship.

Mr. Andrus, Treasurer of Ocean Grove, gave the financial statement, and then the "March around Zion" began, Bishop Wilson and the minister leading and the people following, going through the Tabernacle, Thornley Chapel, the Temple, back to the Auditorium. The people sang "When the roll called up yonder." The whole atmosphere was full of love and enthusiasm. Group after group with bright shining faces would take up the strain: "We are marching to Zion beautiful, beautiful Zion! When the long line of marchers re-entered the Auditorium Bishop Wilson asked them to sing: "Go be with you till we meet again." Tears were rolling down the cheeks of many at the thought of separation.

The Bishop pronounced the benediction, and the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting for 1908 ended—with hand-shaking and joy for all God's blessings and souls won.

Mrs. Kennard Chandler, one of the pioneers of Ocean Grove, testified, and so did Amanda Smith and Alexander DeHaven, a member of the Association. Another said: "I have served the Lord 68 years." So the tide rose until the good Bishop announced the closing hymn.

The Love Feast was merged into the morning preaching. The people were ready to listen to the deeply spiritual sermon, which was preached by Bishop Wilson to a congregation of ten thousand. He spoke with inspiration, his text being Acts 26: 29—Paul before Agrippa. At the close of the sermon, in response to the invitation, hundreds arose all over the audience and then the people, hushed into stillness, quietly bowed in prayer. In the evening, the Auditorium was filled to overflowing, and Rev. I. G. Wilson, of Philadelphia, gave a short address. He was followed by Dr. Morgan, who

FOURTY THOUSAND WORKERS PARADE

The Labor Day Parade on Fifth Avenue

An Organization Marching in Lower New York

FEW indeed are the cities and towns in America that do not observe Labor Day with parades and excursions in which not only those who may strictly be termed workingmen take part, but so others who are glad to take advantage of the opportunity for a "day off" offered by this latest national holiday.

The larger cities, such as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago, have parades which equal a standing army in numbers and in which the representatives of almost every occupation. New York had two parades on the recent holiday, with fully forty thousand "sons of toil" in line. A great many of the organizations prepared for it weeks in advance and wore some sort of uniform emblematic in a way of the calling in which the men are engaged.

A great many people in New York who are looking for excitement went to Fifth Avenue to see a conflict between two labor parades, but two thousand policemen lined the street and everything passed off quietly. The United Teamsters of America are not allied to the American Federation of Labor, which was to turn out thirty thousand strong. The teamsters number ten thousand. The latter organization had secured their permit first to march along Fifth Avenue at half past nine in the morning and said they would even if the larger parade was there. The authorities, however, declared for the Federation of Labor, and sent a large force of police on foot and on horseback to keep the paraders apart.

The Grand Marshal of the Federation parade started his men not only on time but perhaps a little before, and this did much to prevent trouble. In fact, he blew lustily on his whistle to start the marchers, even before all of the delegates had arrived. The crowds cheered heartily as New York's greatest labor parade moved off, with a fine corps of mounted police to lead the men down town.

It moved from Central Park down the length of Fifth Avenue to pass beneath the Washington Arch at the entrance of old Washington Park. The sidewalks were packed from the houses to the curb with interested spectators, in good part made up of friends or relatives of the marchers. They were on the lookout for their own "John" or "Jack" and he was sure of a hearty round of applause when they caught sight of him.

The uniforms worn by many of the organizations were very natty affairs. A great many wore sweaters with their organization badges embroidered on the front. White belts and hats added a military effect. A large number of trade banners and mottoes were carried, in addition to "Old Glory," which waved at the head of every delegation.

The women delegates in the parade came in for round after round of applause. They rode in "sight-seeing" automobiles and their pretty dresses added much to the picturesqueness of the parade.

The floats were elaborate, but instead of showing the workmen at their daily tasks as was the custom in former years, a custom borrowed from old Fourth of July parades, they were for the most part emblematic, beautifully decorated and sometimes filled with the laughing, happy children of the members who tramped behind. The decorations extended even to the horses that drew these modern triumphal cars, the harnesses and horses' heads being covered with bunting and miniature flags.

Many of the organizations went off on excursions in a body for the afternoon, or else took their families to the beach, or to see the sights at Coney Island.

The teamsters' parade started two hours later. It was composed of drivers and chauffeurs to the number of ten thousand. They formed at Central Park and went over the same line of march as the Federation of Labor parade. The striking milk drivers took part and attracted much attention.

AMONG THE OUTCASTS OF LONDON

AT THE mission in North London, with which I am connected — one of the great institutional churches of the metropolis — a small band of workingmen calling themselves the "Crusaders" recently made plans for next winter's work among the hundreds of homeless and starving wanderers who might by night be found on the Thames embankment and in the city streets. At midnight they go out armed with bags of bread and butter and quantities of good literature. They go searching under the railway arches and the bridges where the poor derelicts are huddled, and distribute the food, giving, wherever possible, a helping word, returning home at about four o'clock in the morning.

The Salvation Army does this work on a larger scale, distributing hot soup night after night to the long despairing line of sunken humanity, but there is something peculiarly striking about the humbler work of the independent "Crusaders." There is only one free shelter for homeless men, and that is Medland Hall, Ratcliffe Highway.

Medland Hall is run by the London Congregational Union, and in sixteen years over two million men have here received free shelter and food, the cost being provided by voluntary subscriptions. Three halfpence per night (about three cents) pays for a man's lodging. Between three and four hundred are fed and sheltered every night. In many cases work is found for the men.

While visiting the institution recently, I had a chat with Mr. L. H. Tatham, who was the means of arousing the interest of many churches in this work. He himself has spent many nights, disguised as a tramp, among those "in the abyss," and he says, "If my experiences have taught me one thing more than another, it is that in all of these outcasts there is some good. What they feel most is that everybody looks on them as suspicious characters. They want the kind word of a friend." HAROLD MURRAY.

Shelving the Gospel

IN AN interview published in a weekly contemporary, the Rev. W. L. Watkinson, of the Wesleyan Church, accounts for the loss of several thousand members in that denomination last year in a very simple but conclusive manner. "It was through preaching politics in the pulpit," he says, "and absorption in socialistic themes." Those preachers in whose congregations the decline was most pronounced were men who, if they did not forget the Gospel, at all events put it on the shelf for a time, while they undertook to instruct their people on politics, sociology and various other extraneous topics, which the hearers felt could be more skillfully and far more appropriately discussed in the pages of some magazine or weekly publication. When a pulpit is secularized, its spiritual influence instantly declines; it loses its power to "draw" men when it fails to lift up Christ. It is true, there are occasions—as in great national crises, or when the moral welfare of a municipality or a community is at stake—when it is the opportunity and the duty of the pulpit to deal plainly with outside topics; but in such instances, the high moral principles involved bring them clearly within the proper domain of pulpit treatment. For the preacher who goes afield and searches everywhere except in the Bible, and who chooses to shine as a sociological, political or historical essayist, or as a narrator of descriptive travel, rather than as a messenger of the Most High to a salvation-seeking world, there can be nothing in store on spiritual lines save disappointment and failure. Men and women want the Gospel, and when they do not get it there, they go elsewhere. It is significant that those churches that keep it constantly in view, have no complaints to make of thin audiences and empty pews.

The Public School Army

EVERY year the army of young people which enlists in the fall and winter campaign for the purpose of winning an education offered free in our public schools, increases by many thousands. This month over sixteen millions have enrolled in the common schools alone, a standing army greater than the combined standing armies of many European Powers, and filled with more potential power; for America is looked upon as the teacher and pioneer in developing the common school system, and her methods are copied in both hemispheres. A short time ago a large delegation of English school teachers came to this country to investigate American methods and were greatly astonished not only at the fine buildings devoted solely to school purposes, but at the almost universal desire to obtain as much education as possible that is so strong a characteristic of our twentieth century boys and girls. If the number of pupils in our colleges and private schools were added to the number of scholars mentioned above it would enlarge the figures to even more startling proportions.

The September opening of the schools is one of the most important factors in American life. It affects not only all of the children, but their parents and an army of about half a million teachers, and the greater part of the mercantile houses. Vacations are timed with the opening of the schools, and thousands of clerks are back in the stores to attend to the outfitting of the "young hopefuls" who are getting ready for their year's work with perhaps mingled emotions. The opening of school, however, seems to be regarded with less regret by the rising generation than was the case with many of their elders. Even the youngest seem to be imbued with the idea that their chances for success will be in proportion to the time they spend in the schoolroom. Again, the system of instruction has been more scientifically prepared and is better adapted to the ages of the pupils. Methods of teaching are more attractive and the teacher uses every means to arouse the industry and enthusiasm of the pupil. The school houses in the larger cities are in many instances far more pleasant and hygienic than the homes from which the children come, and the desire to "play truant" seems to be on the decrease.

The care of our schools should be one of the foremost objects to all patriotic men and women who love our distinctive institutions even though no child of theirs is learning within their walls.

Safeguarding the President

PEOPLE about Oyster Bay, Long Island, where the President makes his summer home, were greatly stirred recently when it was rumored that an attempt had been made on the President's life. Mr. Roosevelt goes about freely, sometimes with only a friend or two, taking long tramps in the country or riding horseback with his sons or some military officer.

While riding near Sagamore Hill and about to return home, a shot was heard by the President and several people in the vicinity. Mr. Roosevelt wished to search the woods to find out by whom the shot was fired. It was thought that it might have been the accidental discharge of a hunter's gun, or a stray shot at target practice. He was, however, persuaded to give up the search. It was at first feared lest the shot might have been fired by some one of the many cranks that are constantly coming to Oyster Bay. It is still doubtful whether any one really attempted to commit an outrage; but the constant attempts of irresponsible individuals to see the President makes the country apprehensive. The day following, a man recently released from an insane asylum, who carried a loaded revolver, was arrested in the vicinity of the President's home while trying to elude the guards. It is said that dozens of people mentally unbalanced or filled with wild ideas on the duties of the government, have often tried to see the President to urge him to do the impossible or act in accordance with their own notions. The secret service has constantly to be on the watch for such people and see that they are railroaded out of town. It is the record of history that such peril is inseparable from exalted position. The post of honor seems to be the post of danger.

A New Temperance Ally

"PROBLEM novels," so-called, have not always proved good, wholesome reading. There have been many of them, of late years, that were not of a character calculated to improve the morals of the reading community. But the popular story-writer is a power to be reckoned with, and hence we are grateful to learn that one of the best known of this class of authors, Miss Marie Corelli, in a new book now in press, has directed the batteries of her eloquence full against the drink evil. She claims that "Americans do not appear to grasp the extent of the evil wrought on rural populations by the tyranny of the drink traffic," and declares that they do not show enough sympathy with the efforts of earnest and hard-working local pastors to better conditions in localities where the brewer and distiller are destructively dominating the public health and morals. We imagine the author is not fully informed as to the situation here, and especially concerning the remarkable results of the Prohibition crusade. Temperance folks, however, will gladly welcome the accession of so talented an ally. The round shot she fires into the drink camp are well aimed and should prove effective. "There's never been a brewery," she writes, "without its chemical shop close by." One of her characters says:

To get the cash back that has been spent on these great buildings which exist for the distribution of poisoned beer and alcohol, hundreds, ay, thousands of men and women must drink till they die! Otherwise there would be no "profits."

Let us hope that her work will help along the coming emancipation.

Is Brazil to Emulate Japan?

WHILE Japan's rapid rise to power among the nations is still exciting wonder, we seem likely to have, in our own hemisphere, an illustration of sudden naval development in an unexpected quarter. Brazil in 1889 discarded the imperial house of Braganza and deposed Dom Pedro, the reigning emperor. This vigorous young republic of eighteen millions of people for nearly twenty years has been making steady, though quiet, progress. Suddenly the old conservative policy is flung aside and Brazil declares to the world her intention of entering on a career of naval development which promises to make her the most formidable of the entire group of South American republics. She is building in England a modern navy and she already has launched the first of three great warships—Minas Geraes, which experts pronounce the equal in speed, armament and fighting power of any ship of the famous Dreadnought class now afloat. Her sister ships will be of the same formidable type. Brazil's sea-power, in addition to her three new battleships, consists of three second-rate battleships, two second-class cruisers, one of the third class, five torpedo gunboats, and thirteen torpedo boats, with a fighting force of 8,500 men. Argentina and Chile will soon follow Brazil's example in building modern battleship squadrons. Whether the naval programme of these republics has been inspired by the fact that they were regarded as insignificant factors by the Hague Conference, or whether they have been stirred by Japan's marvelous leap power, is uncertain—perhaps both causes contributed to the change. It may be, also, that the view of our own warships to their ports have set them thinking. Ten years of fleet building may make the republics south of us a combined power not to be lightly disregarded in the councils of nations.

New Sultan of Morocco

THE Sultan Abdul Aziz has been driven from power in Morocco and his half-brother, Sultan Muley Abdul Hafid, has taken his place. It was not a peaceful revolution that led to the retirement of the old ruler, but a test at arms in which the revolutionist manifested more brains, tact, energy and popular power. The revolutionist administered Southern Morocco with great ability and restored order with a firm hand. In his contest for the rulership of the country the successful issue of the battle of Marrakesh settled all doubt and made him the undisputed ruler of the whole nation. He is supreme ruler in the two capitals, Fez and Marrakesh, and has been formally proclaimed in Tangier. Hafid, unlike his brother Aziz, whose mother was a Circassian, is a pure Moor, a son of the people by a Moorish woman, and he is as strong as his brother is weak. He is a man of great personal courage, has reputation for wisdom, and is the idol of the common people. In the national contest it was the survival of the fittest. As Morocco has played such a part in the politics of Europe, this change of Sultans is giving some of the great Powers food for reflection and cause for action. Emperor William, keen of intellect and always on the alert to make a bold stroke for himself and his nation, has recognized Muley Hafid as the Sultan of Morocco, and the other Powers which are interested in the question will no doubt come into line by taking the same action. In these days of peace conferences and international visits of rulers and professions of hearty good will, it may be just as well for the peace of Europe that the people of the nations which cause jealousy shall clear up their own difficulties as completely as the inhabitants of Morocco have done.

He prospered whithersoever he went forth; and he rebelled against the king of Assyria and served him not. (II. Kings 18:7.)

On Spots and the Earth

The sun by its heat and other qualities has such an effect upon the earth that it is responsible scientifically for all life, animal and vegetable. Prof. George E. Hale, formerly the Director of the Lick Observatory, and now conducting special astronomical researches on Mount Wilson, Calif., claims to have discovered that the sun does much more for the earth than to bring it day and summer; that it affects its electrical currents, stirs its currents of air and waves of sea into torrents of fire; that it lays the hand of life and breathes the life-giving breath of pestilence in the faces of the people. For a long while scientists have observed a curious correspondence between certain terrestrial phenomena and the appearance of sun spots. When solar disturbances are most numerous and attain their largest size, as they do at intervals of about eleven years, the certain microscopic swing of the magnetic needle which occurs daily is perceptibly agnified. When the sun spots are particularly large magnetic storms occur, in which there are marked interference with telegraphic service and erratic behavior in delicately poised instruments magnetic observatories, and auroral displays. There have been striking coincidences between the weather and solar disturbances; famines in India due to drouth have apparently recurred at some stage of the eleven-year sun spot. Tropical cyclones are said to be more numerous when sun spots are at a maximum. Whatever may be the theory of the astronomer, or whatever scientific effect the sun may have on the electrical currents, the storms or calms of this little world of ours, the Hand that made the sun and the earth is the one who furnishes them all their energy and gives them wise direction in all their activities.

Blessed of the Lord be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew and for the deep that coucheth beneath and for the precious fruit brought forth by the sun. (Deut. 33:13, 14.)

Russian Cruelties

According to a report signed by thirty-one members of the third Duma, there were 1,170 persons in the Lettish Region executed without trial, and a larger number were logged or otherwise tortured. These men were massacred within a period of six or seven months. The punishments at first were in the character of inquisition tortures which were carried on in concealment, not to inflict pain but to obtain confessions from the arrested persons, and consequently to deliver them up to the military courts. However, it happened often that such confessions could not be obtained, and then the persons arrested were simply shot or killed with bayonets without even the form of a trial. In such cases it was ordered to report that the prisoner was killed while making an attempt to escape.

Count Tolstoi in his recent paper "Government by Execution" terrifically arraigns the Russian government for its official cruelties. In his indictment the Count says: "Your government men call the acts of the revolutionaries 'atrocities' and 'great crimes,' but they have done nothing and are doing nothing that you have not done, and done to an incomparably greater extent. They only do what you do. You keep spies, deceive, and spread printed lies, and so do they. . . . They are altogether your disciples; they have, as the saying is, picked up all your little dodges; they are not only your disciples, they are your products, your children. If you did not exist, neither would they. . . . However odious their murders may be, they are still not so coldly, systematically cruel as your Schlussemburgs, transportations, gallows, and shootings." It is a long step toward reform when light has been thrown on the dark deeds of men and nations. The oppressions and cruelties that have distressed the world for thousands of years must cease under the light of our civilization and Christianity.

With force and with cruelty have ye ruled them. (Ezek. 34:4.)

Popularity of Turkey's Sultan

The Sultan of Turkey through wise statesmanship and likely through fear gave his people a constitution with the promise of a parliament. It is a question whether he did so in time to save his throne, for the Young Turk party is powerful and was very sullen. It may be his change of policy from that of an absolute despot to that of a limited monarch may bind the people to him and continue his lease of power. There has been a very sudden and decided change in the hearts of many of the people toward him, and his professed interest in the common people and his spirit of kindness to offenders and political prisoners have excited a vast amount of popular enthusiasm in his favor. No president of a republic could have a much more enthusiastic reception than the present Sultan has when he passes through the streets of Constantinople. The making of the maps of hemispheres, the changing of dynasties, the deposition or elevation of rulers are brought about by brave soldiers, great generals and able statesmen, but these are only the instruments in the hands of the Great Ruler who has the destiny of all men in his hands and rules for the happiness and welfare of his children and the promotion of his kingdom in the earth.

Let my people go that they may serve me. (Ex. 9:1.)

A Girl's Heroic Sacrifice

Another heroine appears in the person of Mrs. Sallie Rooke, a little telephone operator who, after saving forty families from drowning, lost her own life as a consequence. Mrs. Rooke was the telephone operator at Folsom, N. M. She was warned over the wire of a terrible flood rushing down the valley. She had ample time to escape; but instead of doing so, she took the directory and called up the number of each name in order and said, "Pack up and leave at once. Flood is coming down the valley." She was still at her sweet task, like that of an angel, when the waters took her away to her death. Her body was found twelve miles away, the head-gear worn by the operators still fastened to her head. Some thirty others were lost, but fully 150 were saved who would have been drowned if she had left her post and saved herself. Of all the stories recorded by pen or sung in verse this is one of the most beautiful. Her heroism matches that of any battlefield, and her sacrifice was equal to that of any of the martyrs of the past. It seems a great pity for such a lovely life to be extinguished in such a manner; yet she taught more and did more in those last few moments of her life, than the average woman could in a hundred years. A poor telephone girl at a few dollars a week, she was as royal as any queen that ever sat upon a throne. The only sovereignty is that of service; the highest royalty is that of sacrifice.

He saved others; himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27:42.)

America Teaching Science to China

Earl T. Hobart, of Brookline, Mass., has started for San Francisco, whence he will sail for China the latter part of September, under a three years' engagement with the College of Science at Peking. He will establish and equip a department of electricity in connection with this institution, and the department will be the first of the kind in China. Mr. Hobart was accompanied by Kuei Ling Wu, secretary of the Board of Communications of the Chinese Empire, who will enter the service of his government in Peking. He has spent the last three years in extensive travel, returning to this country from Russia in July. On their way across the United States, they will make several stops to buy electrical equipment for the new department of the Chinese College. They intend this department to be equal to anything of its kind in this country. Among the places to be inspected are the plants of the General Electric Company, Schenectady, the Westinghouse Electric Company, Pittsburgh, and the Western Electric Company, Chicago. The East, toward which the West used to look for life, now looks to the West for mental and spiritual light. The most vivid imagination can scarcely picture the changes that will be wrought in the progress of the world, when China shall have been waked up as completely as Japan by Western learning, science and government. The adoption of our Western civilization by China will greatly promote her espousal of our Bible and Christian religion.

And nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee, because of the Lord thy God. (Isa. 55:5.)

THE JOHN PAUL JONES EXPEDITION TO FRANCE

By REAR-ADMIRAL CHARLES D. SIGSBEE

(U. S. Navy) In Charge of the Expedition

Admiral Sigsbee

Commodore Paul Jones

IN WRITING my experiences for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I have dealt rather largely with war matters because they were, in fact, matters within my experience. I have also treated my subjects largely from the point of view that I held at the times of the events narrated. Nevertheless, I abhor war because I know the horrors and distresses that war causes. I have seen things with my own eyes and have heard things with my own ears. I need no telling by others. In the present narrative I show, inferentially at least, that the navy is oftentimes an instrument of great value in the cultivation of friendly international relations. Indeed, my own naval career has been filled with examples in which points of seeming friction were smoothed over by friendly visitation and discussion. And the instances are very many.

wherein the navy has tided over difficulties that have interfered with the work of the missionaries. Let the following story be accepted as showing the pleasant side of naval duty.

Knowledge is still fresh in the public mind of the century of obscurity and neglect that shrouded the burial place of John Paul Jones, of the voluntary and patriotic efforts of General Horace Porter, the American Ambassador to France, to discover the remains, and of his triumphant success after years of persistency filled with enforced lapses. We know that the remains were discovered in such a state of preservation that they could be visually identified. We know also that they were, nevertheless, subjected to an exhaustive scientific comparison with all known records, and with the remarkable statuary busts made of the hero in his last years by the eminent sculptor Houdin, whereby identification was confirmed with such accuracy that science could not present a reasonable doubt. It should be as well known that General Porter bore the immense expense from his private purse and without the wish for reimbursement; also that the general, a graduate of West Point, with eminent army service, and with army affiliations of a lifetime, had, as his ultimate pride, the delivery of the remains of that naval hero to the custodianship of the navy. Let the navy take affectionate notice!

On June 18, 1905, a column of four glistening, white naval vessels left Staten Island, under my command, for Cherbourg, France, charged with the duty of bringing to the United States the remains of our national hero, whose history reads like romance. The vessels of the expedition consisted of the Brooklyn (my flagship), Captain John M. Hawley; Tacoma, Commander Reginald F. Nicholson; Galveston, Commander William G. Cutler, and Chattanooga, Commander Alexander Sharp.

Naturally officers and men, regarding this duty as a great honor, entered on it with fine spirit, which was sustained to the end. Although 500 of our officers and men were to march in procession in Paris, we had no concerted drills of the whole body by way of preparation. It was hardly necessary. We are always ready to make a good presentation in public. In Paris, acting in behalf of the expedition, were Mr. Robert S. McCormick, the American Ambassador to France, General Horace Porter, who had been appointed First Special Ambassador of President Roosevelt in connection with the matters in view, and Lieutenant Roy C. Smith, U. S. N., National Attaché to the American Embassy. Mr. Francis S. Loomis, Assistant Secretary of State, was Second Special Ambassador of the President. I had expected to take Mr. Loomis to France on board my flagship, but state affairs detained him in Washington. We were compelled to sail without him, but he joined us in Cherbourg and Paris.

We left Staten Island quickly after the receipt of orders so as to keep ahead of a storm area that was coming east over the United States. The southern steamship route was taken to avoid icebergs and flocks that had been reported south of the Grand Banks. The distance to Cherbourg by that route is 3,209 nautical miles. Most of the passage was made at a speed of twelve knots or nautical miles. At times the three smaller ships plunged into the moderately heavy seas till their hulls were obscured behind the "bones between their teeth," that is to say, behind the great white walls of their bow waves. Entering the English Channel, we sighted Bishop's Rock lighthouse, Scilly Islands. Thereafter we had thick fog, with strong and varying tidal currents, continuously for more than eighteen hours. During this long period we rarely saw each other, nor did we once hear or see any outside aid to navigation. At 9:30 A.M., on June 30, we suddenly entered a rift in the fog and sighted the west entrance to Cherbourg harbor dead ahead and distant about two miles. One vessel after another emerged from the fog, the French flag was saluted, the vessels were conducted to mooring buoys behind the great breakwater and the work in harbor began. We had but eight days in which to do everything. In that period came Sunday and the Fourth of July. Two colliers were to arrive on Sunday, June 30. From these two colliers four ships were to be coaled—a serious interference with formalities and ceremonies. Vice-Admiral Besson was commandant of the station. The day after our arrival three French war vessels, under Rear-Admiral Leygue, entered the harbor to take part in the ceremonies at Cherbourg. I will not attempt to describe the various formalities of usage and consultations, civil and naval, that ensued at that place. I must rest content with saying that the French officials were courteous, tactful and helpful. In fact, they organized most of the ceremonies that were to follow at Cherbourg, thus leaving us free to give greater attention to the pertaining specially to our further part at Paris. The American Naval Attaché arrived from Paris and made known the programme organized for that city.

In the evening of July 1, after having issued very detailed written instructions relating to our affairs, I started for Paris with a staff of ten officers. The officers were Lieutenants Barnes and McCauley of my personal staff, the Captains of ships, Lieutenant-Commander Bowers, Surgeon Steele, Pay Inspector Heap and Chaplain Bayard. Mr. Henri Marion, Professor of Languages at the United States Naval Academy, who had come across with us, was official interpreter. We arrived at Paris about midnight and were met at the station by Mr. Blanchard of the American Embassy. We then took up our quarters at the Hotel Bristol on Rue de Rivoli. United States Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who was staying at that hotel, did us the honor to join us in the final ceremonies at Paris. July 2 Ambassador Loomis joined us and established himself at the same hotel. This completed our representative circle.

It had been decided that the ceremonies to follow should be a glorification of the dead rather than strictly general, also that the honors paid the deceased should be those of a vice-admiral. When officials of different nations come together as at Paris, it is customary for them to get in touch through the observance of a punctilious etiquette. Accordingly our days were filled with official visits made and received and in attending state banquets given in our honor. The banquets were given by the President of France, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Marine and the American Ambassador. Everything done for us was on a scale of highest courtesy and brilliancy. It was well understood by all of my command that personal matters must give way.

the official character of our mission. Although our hotel was just across the street from the Gallery of the Louvre I did not enter the doors of that institution—therefore I failed in the realization of a long cherished wish.

On the Fourth of July we were to have dined with the American Chamber of Commerce of Paris, but the dinner was abandoned in respect to the memory of Mr. John Hay, tidings of whose death had reached us on July 1. Meanwhile our officers and men at Cherbourg were receiving entertainments and other evidences of good will from the military, naval and civil authorities and from the public as well. On the Fourth of July the public buildings and the Esplanade at Cherbourg were profusely dressed with American and French flags and, throughout the city, the American flag was in evidence. At night there was a brilliant electrical illumination of the war ships of the two nations, also a water carnival in honor of the American visitors. Unfortunately, our people could make but little return because of the grimy condition of our coaling ships. Our tactful French friends understood and made allowance. On Thursday, July 6, the day of the formal transfer of the remains of John Paul Jones

Paris, the landing parties of the several American ships at Cherbourg were roused out at 2 o'clock in the morning. Under the great inconvenience of the situation, they were dressed and armed. While crossing the Atlantic I had directed that the men's hair be newly cut. I quote from my further orders at Cherbourg: "The men will be shaved at as late an hour as the fifth as possible. Shoes will be carefully laced, and every effort made to show the characteristic neatness of our enlisted men. The men will be dressed in clean blue austere clothes, with fresh cap ribbons, cap pommet inserted, and leggings. They will carry rifles, bayonets, canteens filled with distilled water, belts without ammunition and haversacks. The haversacks will contain toilet articles and a shift of blue to protect the men on the return if they get wet during the parade." The haversacks were not worn during the parade.

At 3:30 that morning our 500 officers and men—seamen, marines and the band of the flagship—were on board the train and starting for Paris. They were under the command of Lieutenant-Commander Harry George. At 11:49 A.M., they arrived at the Gare des Invalides in Paris, where they were met by officers representing the Ministries of War and Marine, of military bodies and of the police. Outside the station a detachment, including the band, of the 103d Regiment of French Infantry was waiting. There were greetings and reciprocal musical salutes, after which the 103d escorted our men to the barracks of the Military School (Ecole Militaire) where large tents had been erected on the Esplanade for dining and dressing purposes. There the men "straightened up" and dined. Our officers were cared for, with great courtesy, at the School and at the Military Club, by army and navy officers. Speeches were made and returned. Good will reigned and will be remembered.

At 3 P.M., the ceremonies over the remains of John Paul Jones took place at the American Church of the Holy Trinity, Avenue de l'Alma. Assembled outside were the American seamen and marines and the French troops. General Frey commanded the French troops, consisting of 2,000 infantry, 350 cavalry and two batteries of horse artillery, of six pieces each. There was also an artillery caisson, drawn by six horses with riders, and bearing French and American flags.

Admittance to the church was by card. Even the aisles of the church were filled with people and many could not find entrance. The gathering of people was highly distinguished, even for a great event. The chancel and the body of the church were profusely decorated with palms and flowers. In front of the chancel was the casket covered with flowers. On the right—facing the chancel—were the American representatives and on the left the French representatives. The President of France was represented by General Dubois of his household. There were present M. Rouvier, President of the Council and Minister of Foreign Affairs, the leading Cabinet Ministers and distinguished officers of the army and navy. Virtually the whole Diplomatic Corps was

The body bearers bore the casket to the caisson and at 5 P.M. the procession took up its line of march. With the exception of the cavalry and artillery all were on foot—including civilians and ladies. The omission of carriages was a mark of great respect. Since there were no French seamen present the American seamen were under comparison with the flower of the French soldiery, but they made an excellent impression. The photographs that were taken show that this was justified. The route—which was lined with great numbers of silently respectful people, the men with hats removed—was through the Avenue des Champs Elysées, across the Seine by the beautiful new bridge of Alexandre III., to the wide Esplanade des Invalides. Opposite the Hotel des Invalides, where repose the remains of Napoleon I., a special tent or pavilion had been erected, draped with royal purple velvet and trimmed with gold braid and fringe. It was ornamented with flowers and military arms and accoutrements. In suitable places were the American and French national ensigns. Here the procession was halted and all those connected therewith, who were not under arms, assembled in or around the pavilion.

The casket was taken from the caisson and laid on a catafalque within. Then the several bodies under arms marched past, saluting when opposite the remains. It was indeed an impressive pageant, the most distinguished, I was informed by M. Rouvier, that had been seen in Paris in recent years. The cavalry was the last to pass, which it did at a trot. This ended the joint public ceremony at Paris. With the exchange of many kindly sentiments, the assemblage at the pavilion dispersed. The casket was replaced on the caisson, escorted to the Gare des Invalides and there placed in a mortuary car. The car was sealed and left in charge of a guard. The rest of the landing party returned to the Military School for supper. At 9:10 that night—only eighteen hours from the departure from Cherbourg—the landing party was leaving Paris in the train with the remains of John Paul Jones. Neither I nor my staff returned that day. On the 7th General Porter left for home by way of Cherbourg, where my flagship gave him his ambassadorial gun-salute. To my great regret neither he nor Mr. Loomis could make it convenient to return as my guests. The same day President Loubet sent his representative to our hotel and presented to me the Cross of Commander of the Legion of Honor and to the captains and to Lieutenant-Commander George the Cross of Officer of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Loomis had been similarly honored on a former occasion. The American naval officers left Paris that night and arrived at Cherbourg at 6 A.M. on the 8th.

It was proper to speed our departure from France once the remains had been embarked. This view was made stronger by the death of Mr. Hay. Also I suspected that the French vessels were needed at Brest, where some British war vessels were then due on a visit of special diplomatic importance.

During my absence, arrangements for the further ceremonies at Cherbourg had been made by French present also. There were many ladies of various nationalities. On the front seat, on the right, were Ambassador and Mrs. McCormick, General Porter, Mr. Loomis, Senator Lodge and Rear-Admiral Sigsbee.

The memorial services were conducted by Rev. John B. Morgan, assisted by Rev. M. Van Winkle, Monsieur Mesny and Dr. Tully. The order of exercises was as follows: Hymn 418, the Lord's Prayer, prayer for the President of the United States, two collects, hymns 107 and 144, the fiftieth chapter of Genesis, the nineteenth verse of the thirteenth chapter of Exodus, two special prayers, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," benediction, and "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

At the close addresses were made in the following order: By General Porter in transferring the remains to Mr. Loomis, by Mr. Loomis in transferring the remains to Rear-Admiral Sigsbee, and by Rear-Admiral Sigsbee in accepting the further custodianship and responsibility.

The body bearers were sixteen American petty officers, four from each ship. All were over six feet in stature. They excited much favorable comment.

G. H. M., Brooklyn, N. Y. Can a young man be a true Christian and be active in political work?

Our politics need purifying, and while the temptations are numerous, a clean-hearted Christian, who is divinely strengthened to resist temptation, can become a mighty agent for good. "Practical politics" is a dirty business which affords large opportunities for moral improvement.

Reader, Dayton, O. Please explain I. Sam. 31:4. Saul fell upon his own sword and killed himself. If so, what does II. Sam. 1:10 mean?

The apparent discrepancy is explained by the commentators. The Amalekite's story was a fiction, invented to win David's favor for himself, he knowing that Saul's death would make David king. The man probably witnessed Saul's suicide and tried to turn it to his own account and win a reward, but was properly punished instead.

W. G., Ontario, Ind. How did God communicate with man in olden times? Was it by audible speech or by spirit?

The view taken by the most eminent orthodox Biblical authorities is that God operated on the minds of men in various ways, sometimes by audible words, at others by outward, visible signs, or direct inward suggestions, and again by dreams and visions. His spirit moved and guided his servants to write, to speak, or to act in accordance with his will and purposes.

G. W. H., Holland, Mich. Why is God's name not mentioned in the book of Esther? or was Esther not a Christian?

The book of Esther is purely untheocratic—a presumably faithful recital, without comment, of the words and acts of persons, without any vital recognition of God; yet the book is reckoned in the Jewish canon. Probably the best explanation is that it was a transcript from the chronicles of the Medes and Persians, and that it was meant to be read by heathen. The sacred name was purposely omitted. Many of the ancient Christian authorities regarded the book as non-canonical.

J. C. C., Eastman, Ga. What is to be done with the bridge that fell near Quebec a number of months ago?

The wreckage will be cleared away and the bridge completed. Some changes undoubtedly will have to be made in the plans.

T. C. P., Glasgow, Del. What address of Lincoln's is known as his "Temperance Speech"?

Probably you refer to the following words by Lincoln: "The liquor traffic is a cancer in society, eating out the vitals and threatening destruction, and all attempts to regulate it will not only prove abortive, but will aggravate the evil. There must be no more attempts to regulate the cancer. It must be eradicated, not a root must be left behind; for until this is done, all classes must continue in danger of becoming victims of strong drink."

T. T. H., South Boston, Va. How would you reconcile the story of Achan (Josh. 7) with that of David (I. Samuel 30)?

The cases are dissimilar. There was a specific injunction against taking and keeping the spoil of Jericho for themselves (Josh. 6:18) and it was this that Achan disobeyed.

L. P., Macon, Mo. What is the office of Dean? In what way does it differ from that of bishop?

There are two sorts of deans in the Episcopal church. First, the dean of a cathedral, who is next in authority to a bishop. He is an ecclesiastical magistrate in England. He is head of the chapter of the cathedral and is called dean from the Latin decanus, because ten made up the cathedral chapter. The second class are known in England as rural deans, an office revived from one of ancient days. They have oversight of a number of parishes, visit them and report their condition to their bishop.

N. C., Rockville, Conn. 1. Please explain what is meant in Mark 3:28-30. 2. What is meant in Matt. 16:28?

1. The sin against the Holy Ghost is supposed to have been "the malicious ascription of the dispensations, gifts and influences of the Spirit to the power of Satan." Whosoever committed this sin, despised and rejected the only remedy for man's redemption—the power of the Spirit to influence the soul. 2. This passage was explained recently in THE MAIL-BAG.

Rev. H. A. Benfer of York, Pa., writes our MAIL-BAG, asking information in reference to Prohibition in Maine. Lewis, N.Y. What is the force indicated by "one horse power," or "ten horse power" as applied to a locomotive or gasoline engine?

Horse power is a standard theoretical unit of work, equal to 33,000 pounds lifted one foot high in one minute. This unit was estimated by Boulton and Watt watching strong dray horses working eight hours a day in London. Ten horse power would be the supposed lifting or moving power of ten horses, capable of drawing 33,000 pounds each by cord and pulley.

C. O. B., Oregon City, Oregon. Why does the Bible say God "repents"? In what manner does he repent?

The word "repent," as in Jer. 18:8; Ps. 110:4, means simply that God will not change his purpose. Again, as in Jer. 18:8, it means that the change which the nations returning from evil will experience, is not a change in God, but in

It seems to me Mary Magdalene was healed of a mental disease; she is always mentioned by name in Scripture, for she became a most devoted follower of our Lord and assumed a public place by her service, standing by him at the Cross. The other woman mentioned in Luke 7:37 is a nameless and sudden apparition, a moment seen and then gone forever."

Why Are Teachers Often Weary?

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Making Calls

IF THE editor of this page may judge from her correspondence there is no profession that so taxes the nervous energy of those who practise it as does that of teaching. One would imagine that doctors, lawyers, and numbers of men and women engaged in business would break down in health and strength sooner than teachers in the primary and grammar schools. The great majority of these teachers are young women. The hours of actual work in the schoolroom are usually five or six, as an hour intervenes at noon for luncheon. Saturday is a day off, and in addition to the legal holidays there are the Christmas and Easter vacations, and the long respite during the summer. Nevertheless, teachers often grow very tired, and, while there are those who teach twenty or thirty years consecutively, and are in good health at the end of the time, they are women who have nerves of steel, perfect digestion and extraordinary vitality. There must be a reason why teachers break down, why they grow weary early in the race, and why they often want to exchange this work for something else, welcoming longer hours and longer vacations.

We may understand the situation better if we remember that most teachers are obliged to sacrifice in a measure their individuality, and teach according to a rigid system. The system may be excellent. It has been arranged for the advantage of the many, and, on the whole, it may work well, but it cramps the individual teacher and it is also, as the teacher knows, somewhat unfair to the clever child who is held back to the slower pace of the drone. In the large cities the public schools are terribly overcrowded and the buildings, outwardly fine, are often unsanitary and ill-ventilated. The teacher has to cope with forces of ignorance and prejudice that derive their strength from medieval times. She does not merely introduce foreign-born children and children of diverse races and creeds in arithmetic and geography. She has to instruct them in the alphabet of refinement and to tame in them a dormant savagery. As at present we exact from teachers and scholars an enormous amount of work, including the curriculum studies that might well be omitted from the programme where children are to finish their school work and life at fourteen, the teacher has to do much work out of school. Merely to look over papers and exercises and to prepare for the next day may easily occupy an ordinary teacher's entire evening.

As every one knows who has ever tried it, few forms of human endeavor drain physical energy as does that of impressing mind upon mind. When a conscientious and enthusiastic teacher arrives at the close of her day she has given out so much of herself that she is wearied in the last drop of her blood. If she be conscientious, but lack enthusiasm, she is worse off than the other, for in this case she has fretted against the collar the livelong day.

It goes without saying that nobody should attempt to teach who dislikes children and who scorns the work of training them, neither should any one work in this line only that she may gain a livelihood. The work is too delicate, too fine and too strenuous to be safely done by any one careless of its opportunity for spiritual suggestiveness. One who loves her work and who is grandly successful in it may find it too much for her physical vigor, and may have to spend her vacation from the first day to the last in rest and recuperation. She will take a fresh start and again do nobly, yet her life will be a breaking of the alabaster box of sacrifice. Her friend who frankly admits that she, too, is tired to death of the whole thing, would far better drop it and put her disciplined mind, her activity, her courage and patience to another use. Teaching is the noblest profession we have, not inferior to the ministry, to medicine, or to law in that it deals with children in their most impressionable years. But it is an arduous and exacting line of work, and, in these days,

"WHO READS SHALL WALK IN PEACE"

we are learning that many women have not the requisite strength to engage in it for life, and that the results show the survival of the fittest.

Kissing the Baby

Though the baby is the most kissable being beneath the sun, though the rose-leaf cheek and the flower-like grace of the infant make a bid for caresses, the mother is right who declines to let baby be indiscriminately kissed. Kissing goes by favor when people are grown up, but babies are defenseless and cannot well help themselves. A kiss may be the means of causing illness.

SOCIAL calls loom large in suburban life, as well as in the routine of the smaller towns and villages. Friendly acquaintances enjoy dropping in upon one another in the afternoon, the morning being seldom regarded as an appropriate time for calling. After three o'clock people are supposed to be at leisure to receive their friends informally. A first call should be returned with considerable promptness, as, if this is not done, a doubt arises as to whether the call was welcome. Visiting cards facilitate social intercourse, and in formal affairs, such as At Homes and receptions, are sent by those who cannot attend, and are accepted as an acknowledgment of the invitation. To leave a visiting card, as has often been said, is unnecessary when one runs in for a few minutes' chat in the home of a friend whom one frequently meets. Refreshments are not served to callers by way of convention, but there are cheerful houses in which one may always expect to find the family taking a cup of tea at four or five in the afternoon. Sometimes these homes become informal rallying places for a group of intimate friends. With the tea thin bread and butter, toast or cakes may be offered. One of the easiest ways of keeping up neighborly friendship is indicated in the simple custom of slipping in between three and six o'clock for a half hour of pleasant talk. None of us wish to belong to the hermit souls who dwell apart. We wish, do we not, to have friends and to keep them?

Nine O'clock Headaches

Parents may co-operate with teachers and help the children to do good work by sending them regularly to school. There are small people who would never think of playing truant, but who sometimes have nine o'clock headaches. Tender mothers feel sorry for their darlings and easily yield to the request that they may stay at home for the morning or the afternoon. In a certain household the rule was made that if one of the children complained of illness and asked to remain at home the plea should always be granted without any fuss or opposition. The rule was also made that the child, being ill, must at once go to bed and stay there the entire day. "Of course, dear, if you are not well enough to go to school, bed is the place for you," the mother would say, "and I cannot give a sick child very much to eat, so you will have to get along with a slice of bread and a cup of milk; not another thing." In this family nine o'clock headaches were seldom heard of. As a rule, small boys and girls do not feign illness as an excuse for shirking school attendance, but if they have a fear of being kept in or have somehow drifted into trouble in the class, they may try to put off the day of reckoning. Children, as well as grown people, are much the better if very strictly held to duty.

Who Originates the Fashions?

—Miss B—. You inquire why short sleeves are going out when every one finds them comfortable, and few desire a change. Well, my dear, the fountain of fashion is Paris, and the great dressmaking houses there start new fashions from time to time to keep the wheel of business turning round. We all follow their lead.

The Gladness and Power of the Church

A Mother's Story of the Ark

I WOULD have you know, my children, that there is a verse in the Bible which says: "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him" (Hab. 2: 20). And this is why, when we come into the church, we should bow our heads to God and praise him. It is our greeting to God, who we know is there, though we do not see him. But long, long ago, there was no church anywhere in the world. Instead, people piled up stones and built an altar, and on it they burned sacrifices to God. And God was there, though the people did not see him, just as he is now in the church though we do not see him. Adam and Abraham, and all the good men who lived in those days, built altars instead of churches. Then there came a time when God told a man how he wanted a church. It was not at all like the churches we have. It was a tent church. The sides of it were of boards covered with gold, and its roof was of embroidered linen, and other precious cloths, and fur (badgers' skins dyed red). You will know that it must have been very beautiful, because it cost one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And the beautiful furniture of gold that was put inside cost much more money. That tent was called the Tabernacle. God told Moses how to make every part of it. It was not large, only the size of a very small house (15x45 ft.). And there was a fence of white linen around it which made a court yard of 75x150 feet. The Tabernacle had two rooms in it, one large, and the other small. The small room had in it a beautiful box made of wood, covered with gold, and it had a cover made of solid gold, and on the cover of the box were two angels made of gold, with golden wings. It was called the "Ark." It was not large, not larger than many trunks you have seen. There was a wonderful light shining between the angels, a light brighter than the sun, for it was the shining brightness around God, but God himself could not be seen. And because God's shining brightness rested on the Ark, it was so precious that no one was permitted to put hands on it.

God made a law that it should be carried on poles, slipped through rings which were on the sides of the Ark. And it was also God's law that certain men called Levites, who were almost like ministers, should put the poles through the rings, and so carry the Ark. Something very precious was inside of the Ark: the two tables of stone upon which God had written the Ten Commandments, a pot of manna-food from heaven, and a very precious rod or stick which God had made to grow in a wonderful manner to show who should be the high priest. I am sure you will agree with me that the Ark was the most wonderful box that was ever in the world. You would like to know what happened to it, and where it is now? One day two bad young men, although they were the sons of the high priest, went in and got the Ark and carried it into a battle, for they said, "Wherever the Ark is, God will be there to help." But God took his shining brightness away from the Ark, and the Ark itself was taken by the Philistines, and they set it up in a temple where there was an idol named Dagon. In the morning, when the Philistines came to the temple, they found that Dagon had fallen down, and was all broken in pieces. The Philistines carried the Ark from city to city to show what a wonderful prize they had taken in battle, but in every place where they took the Ark, people became sick and many died. That was God's way of punishing them. At last the Philistines said: "Let us send back the Ark before we all die." They sent it back in a cart drawn by cows, and they put presents of gold in the Ark. The Israelites were so glad and thankful to have it back again, that they took the cows, and offered them as sacrifices to God, and they put the golden presents on the sacrifice and burned them, too. Then the Ark was carried to the house of a good man named Abinadab, away with sad hearts. Meantime the home of Obed-edom was greatly blest with prosperity and happiness because the Ark of God was there, as the families of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were blest because of their family altars. And homes with such altars today are those which have fewest divorces and family quarrels and heart-breaks for wayward boys and girls, and the greatest joy and truest prosperity.

King David asked God what was wrong in his efforts to bring the Ark to Jerusalem, and God told him he had disobeyed the law that the Ark should only be carried upon poles, and by the Levites. And after some time, three months, again King David sent men with silver trumpets through the land to tell the people to come again to bring the Ark to Jerusalem. And they came in as great numbers as before. They went to the home of Obed-edom. They did not take the cart, but poles instead, and they brought it in God's own way to Jerusalem, singing day, with his Spirit as manna in heaven within them and his law in their very hearts, so that they freely and gladly.

What then does it mean to join the Church? It means that we have accepted Jesus as our High Priest, who has offered himself as the Lamb of God that beareth away, as a sacrifice, our sins. It means that we have only been forgiven, but have also been cleansed from our sins, as in a baptism by the Holy Spirit, of which baptism is the symbol, so that we lead new lives. It means that having thus received as friends at God's table the shew-bread of God-given strength has been given us, and our prayers have been received in heaven as sweet incense. It means that we have entered the holy of holies of close fellowship with the real presence of God.

That is what it means to join the Church. But one need not wait to understand all that before joining the Church. Some wise friends of Jesus and of the children in London found a "Children's Christian Band," which was sometimes called "The Children's Church," to which such children were admitted as had quietly signed "I to the following questions: "Do you love Jesus? Are you trying in Jesus as your own precious Saviour? Will you try, by the help of Jesus, to keep up everything that is sinful?"

And as the bringing of the Ark to Jerusalem was the occasion of rejoicing and blessing to the Church of God, should bring to every city a nobler social life.

It was King David's loyalty to God that made him desire to have the Ark of God in the heart of his kingdom, the capital city, Jerusalem. Sometimes people make the mistake of trying to better conditions while leaving out. In our recent travels in far-away Australia, we found a wonderful "Institute of Social Service" located in a great tobacco factory, the free use of which had been given for five years with a gift of $500 additional.

The features of the institutional church had been organized, such as the cradle for babies, the kindergarten for small children, men's clubs, boys' clubs, girls' clubs, gymnasium, roof garden, etc. Indeed, $5,000 had been spent in making necessary alterations and equipping the various departments. The whole scheme had been devised by a clergyman, and he was at the helm. And yet in a leaflet printed for public distribution was this statement: "It is not the intention of this institute to teach religion." And so in the Sabbath day, when one of the grandest Sunday Schools of the world might have been gathered, for it was in the midst of a thickly populated district of laboring people, there was no tempt to have a Sunday School. The managers of that institution were led to see their mistake, and to agree with David to send for the Ark.

A stranger coming into a city asked: "What is that great building?" received the reply, "It is a power house that is felt constantly in all parts of the city, as many kinds of machinery are run by it." "And what is this other big building?" he asked. "That, too, is a power house, a Y. C. A. building whose moral and social influence is exerted every day to benefit all sides of personal and social life." "And is that another power house?" he asked, pointing to the church. "Yes, try to make it so," replied the earnest Christian man.

David and the People Bringing the Ark to Jerusalem and he and his son took good care of it in God's own way for twenty years. That is long enough for a baby boy to grow to be a man.

When David was made king, he thought about the Ark and wished that it might be in the king's city, the holy city of Jerusalem. It was God who gave King David that wish. And King David sent men to blow silver trumpets all over the land to call the people together that they might go with him to bring the Ark to Jerusalem, and put it again in a tabernacle. Thirty thousand people came. It was a grand and glorious time. With the king at their head, marching on, they made a grander procession than you have ever seen. But very strangely, King David had forgotten something God had said. You will know what he had forgotten when I tell you that he had a new cart made in which to bring back the Ark, and two oxen to draw it. King David had forgotten that God had said the Ark should be carried only on poles and by the Levites. But the Ark was taken out of the house of Abinadab, and put into the cart, and the oxen started to go. The Ark was shaken about in the cart, and a man named Uzzah put his hand against it to steady it, and he fell down dead. Then King David was afraid to bring the Ark any further, so he had it taken into the house of a man named Obed-edom, and all of the people went back to their homes far and dancing for joy, and playing upon instruments of music and praising God. King David wore a beautiful white linen robe on that day. He had his harp in his hands, and played upon it while he sang songs of praise to God. Let us read the words of his songs (1. Chron. 16: 7-36, also Ps. 24 and 122). You would like to know where that precious Ark is to-day? It was kept in the tent as long as King David lived, and then a glorious temple was built for it by Solomon, the son of King David. The temple was destroyed after four hundred years and the Ark with it, by an army of ruthless soldiers.

The falling of the Philistine idols when the Ark of God was brought into their temple suggests a missionary lesson, for all over the world idols have been falling for more than two thousand years.

The Meaning and Mission of the Church

This lesson most of all pictures the meaning and mission of the Church of God, symbolized in the ancient tabernacle, of which the Ark was the very heart. We sometimes call the church building "a church," and the people inside whose names are on the church book are more accurately called "a church." But the true spiritual church of God is something much smaller, made up of true Christians only. They are the Ark of God to-offices and Lieutenant-Commander Hoombe. The latter had been left sent officer present. On the 8th the case was placed in a specially prepared pavilion on the quay, through the courtesy of M. LePont. While there it was under the continuous guard of sixteen French seamen and sixteen American seamen. Fresh flowers had been laid on the casket and in this the daughter of Vice-Admiral Besson had expressed a very pleasing interest.

1 P.M. the American landing party was sent on shore to the quay, which was decorated along its whole length with French and American flags. Assembled there were French officers, soldiers, and sailors, who were joined by the American officers, marines and sailors. Alongside the quay was the French torpedo boat Zouave dressed with French and American flags and flying the American flag at heringle masthead. The soldiers and sailors were drawn up on three sides of square with the officers within. Admiral Besson read a brief address, expressing good will and alluding to our joint history. Time was important to the French vessels, or so I believed, therefore I replied only by shaking hands and giving thanks for the many courtesies that we had received. The case was carried on board the Zouave under guard of the sailors of both nations. The Zouave steamed out into the harbor. A column of French boats formed on her port quarter and a column of American boats on her starboard quarter, the admirals leading their respective columns in the barges. The landing parties left the shore later. The rails of the ships were manned. Fifteen minute-guns were fired by the French flagship Bouines and then repeated by the Brooklyn. The Zouave steamed slowly to the starboard side of the Brooklyn and the boats pulled to the port side. Offers went on board. Reverently the case was hoisted on board, prayers were offered by Chaplain Bayard and the casket was lowered to the gun deck. Just outside my cabin door a dais had been constructed and overhung by a draped and ornamented canopy. The casket was secured on the dais and covered with a silk American ensign, presented by Mrs. Donald Mcane in behalf of the Daughters of the American Revolution. The beautiful floral emblems were replaced and a serry posted over the casket.

After a few kind words of parting the French officers took their final departure. At 5:30 P.M. the American vessels got under way and put to sea. When passing the French vessels the side was manned and three hearty cheers given and returned. The Brooklyn then repeated her former national salute of twenty-one guns to the French flag and the Bouines saluted the American flag likewise. While yet in the offing we saw the French vessels put to sea bound for Brest.

The return passage—with the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., as our destination—was made at ten and eleven knots speed. We had some fairly heavy seas and some foggy and misty weather. Off Nantucket lightship we were met by a squadron of Rear-Admiral Evans' ships and by them escorted to Chesapeake Bay. At the mouth of the Bay, Admiral Evans, with his first division, fired minute-guns and then parted company. Rear-Admiral Davis, with the second division of four vessels, continued the escort. We anchored off Annapolis, in sight of the Naval Academy, at 9 A.M. on July 23. We found there the French armored cruiser Jurien de la Graviere, commanded by Captain Gervais.

Rear-Admiral Sands, superintendent of the Naval Academy, had already organized the ceremonies appropriate for our further action. At 9 A.M., on the 24th, the American landing parties went on shore. There they were joined by Captain Gervais with a delegation of his officers and fifty sailors. The casket was lowered to the after deck of the tug Standish, placed under guard and, attended by myself with a staff of officers, conveyed to the water front of the Academy, where a temporary pavilion had been erected. With rigorous formality the casket was carried to the shore and placed in a hearse. Escorted by many American and French officers, a battalion of midshipmen, and by seamen and marines from the Academy and from the ships, the remains of John Paul Jones were taken to the open expanse of lawn in front of Blake Row. There, in the centre of a beautiful space, bordered by graceful, overhanging trees and environed by scenes and memories hallowed to generations of naval officers, a temporary brick vault had been built. The escorting detachments were formed about the vault, to the interior of which the casket was then borne. The door of the vault was closed and locked. A company of marines fired three volleys over the remains, a bugler sounded the solemn "taps"—and a national duty to a national hero, a duty too long delayed, had been accomplished.

President Roosevelt had designated as the final resting place of the remains a crypt in the beautiful chapel then under construction in the Academy. There they were deposited on April 24, 1906, with appropriate pageantry and ceremonial exercises. Many distinguished people were present and addresses were made. French men-of-war were at Annapolis to participate. The hospitalities that we had received at Paris and Cherbourg were returned at Washington and Annapolis by President Roosevelt and others. But these final events were not within my own experience. At that time I was cruising in the Mediterranean with the four vessels that I had commanded in the expedition to France.

In Peril Amid Arctic Ice Floes

contrary winds, carrying its occupants many miles from home, and the anxious nights spent by those on the ice and those on shore are not soon forgotten.

Next day, I traveled over part of their hunting ground towards another settlement of Eskimos. The ice was indeed very thin and, as we soon found out, already on the move. We, too, had a narrow escape before we succeeded in rounding the cape. We came to a gradually widening strip of water. The sledge just before ours swiftly bridged the gulf; but as the ice was very thin, it broke up the edges, making it impossible for us to follow. After some search we were able to cross, but the ice was no longer stationary; it was heaving and grinding beneath us. Had we been half an hour later, we would surely have been cut off; for the gap widened now rapidly and was soon seen by the two men who had been our hosts the night previous. They believed us to be cut off and they got a small boat ready to come out and rescue us. On climbing a hill, they saw the now broad expanse of water, but of us they could see nothing, as we had already rounded the next cape and were out of sight. Before night we safely reached the next settlement, and we were all very thankful to God for our wonderful preservation.

ACKNOWLEDGING A TRUST*

FOR every mother who instructs her children about giving to the Lord, there are probably hundreds who teach them, if they are boys, to take their hats off to ladies; or, if they are girls, to dress becomingly. There is no doubt that if Christian parents would only systematically and fervently admonish their children on this subject, the stinginess of men and women toward the church and all good causes would largely disappear. To this end, every child who is old enough to understand anything about money should have his own allowance, however small, to be spent for certain well-defined objects—one of which should be his church.

But he should be duly impressed with the fact that money is not his or capital. He has time, strength, and, of all that he has, a portion should be given to the Lord, and the Scriptural "tithing," or tenth, is the least that should be offered.

Even taking into consideration the fact that all Scriptural injunctions were chiefly addressed, one cannot but be deeply affected by the emphasis laid throughout the whole Book upon the duty and the beauty of giving. In the teachings of Jesus, such counsel is carried to an extreme. We are told to take no thought for the morrow. If one asks our coat we are to deliver up to him our cloak also. We are to give constantly and we are assured that we shall be repaid in full measure, "pressed down and running over."

The wisest commentators explain to us that these injunctions are not to be taken literally, any more than are those concerning the hatred of a Christian for his father and mother. Jesus told his disciples that they must hate their nearest and dearest, or else they could not follow him. This simply meant, of course, that love for him must completely overshadow and dwarf all other loves.

So, applying this same principle to the other case, they must give all that they possibly could. The Oriental method of speech seems to necessitate exaggerated figures. That must always be remembered in weighing Scriptural commands.

It is said that a generous man was reproved by one of his parsimonious brethren for his reckless extravagance in giving to foreign missions. It was preposterous, said the thrifty one, to be sending abroad such heaps of money as this man and others were giving to missions, while there were so many unemployed and starving in their home town.

"I will give fifty dollars to the poor of our city, if you will give an equal sum," cried his Christian friend.

"I did not mean that," protested the selfish man, "I simply mean that there is no use in going so far away. Now here are the Indians in the West. They constantly need assistance."

"Very well," rejoined his ready companion, "I will give a hundred dollars this minute for the benefit of our Indians, if you will do the same."

"I do not mean that either," stammered the hounded miser. What he really meant was that he did not see why anybody should ever give anything away.

And yet if that curmudgeon had only been properly brought up, it is not unlikely that he might have been glad to give.

"I feel deeply the poverty and suffering of which you speak," protested a close-fisted man to one who was begging him to give to a good cause.

"Where do you feel it?" inquired the solicitor.

"In my heart and soul—"

"Oh," said the other, "if you only would feel in your pocket!"

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend. Margaret investigates the mills and sees many children at work. She informs Frank that she is going to live among them, and he asks if she will stay, saying her presence means everything to one at Belcourt. She thinks he refers to his brother Ned, and says, "No." She undertakes her work at "Mill House," but wonders why McGinnis does not come to see her. At last he says he has to stay away because he loves her. She finds that she reciprocates his affection and they become engaged. Ned returns to announce that Frank has been ill, and they are all coming home.

NED'S call was not an unqualified success, at least not so far as Margaret was concerned. The young man was plainly displeased with the cane-seated chair in which he sat, and with his hostess's simple toilet. The reproachful look had gone from his eyes, it is true, but in its place was one of annoyed disapproval, which was scarcely less unpleasant to encounter. There were long pauses in the conversation, which neither participant seemed able to fill. Once Margaret tried to tell her visitor of her work, but he was so clearly unsympathetic that she cut it short and introduced another subject. Of McGinnis she did not speak; time enough for that when Frank Spencer should return and the engagement would have to be known. She did tell him, however, of her plans to go to New York later, in search of the lost twins.

"I shall take Patty with me," she explained, "and we shall make it a sort of vacation. We both need the change and the—well, it won't be exactly a rest, perhaps."

"No, I fear not," Ned returned grimly. "I do hope, Margaret, that when Della gets home you'll take a real rest and change at Belcourt. Surely by that time you'll be ready to cut loose from all this sort of thing!"

Margaret laughed merrily, though her eyes were wistful.

"We'll wait and see how rested New York makes me," she said.

"But, Margaret, you surely are going to come to Belcourt then," appealed Ned, "whether you need rest or not!"

"We'll see, Ned, we'll see," was all she would say, but this time her voice had lost its merriment.

Ned, though he did not know it, and though Margaret was loath to acknowledge it even to herself, had touched upon a tender point. She did long for Belcourt, its rest, its quiet and the tender care that its people had always given her. She longed for even one day in which she would have no problems to solve, no misery to try to alleviate—one day in which she might be the old care-free Margaret. She reproached herself bitterly for all this, however, and accused herself of being false to her work and her dear people; but in the next breath she would deny the accusation and say that it was only because she was worn out and "dead tired."

"When the people do get home," she said to Bobby McGinnis one day, "when the people do get home, we'll take a rest, you and I. We'll go up to Belcourt and just play for a day or two. It will do us good."

"To Belcourt?—I?" cried the man. "Certainly; why not?" returned Margaret, quickly, a little annoyed at the surprise in her lover's voice. "Surely you don't think that the man I'm expecting to marry can stay away from Belcourt; do you?"

"N—no, of course not," murmured McGinnis; but his eyes were troubled, and Margaret noticed that he did not speak again for some time.

It was this, perhaps, that set her own thoughts into a new channel. When, after all, had she thought of them before together—Bobby and Belcourt? It had always been Bobby and—the work.

CHAPTER XXXIV

IT WAS on a particularly beautiful morning in June that Margaret and Patty started for New York—so beautiful, that Margaret declared it to be a good omen.

"We'll find them—you'll see!" she cried.

Little Maggie had been left at the Mill House with the teachers, and for the first time for years Patty found herself care-free, and at liberty to enjoy herself to the full.

"I hain't had such a grand time since I was a little girl an' went ter Mont-Lawn," she exulted, as the train bore them swiftly toward their destination. "Even when Sam an' me was married we didn't stop fur no play-day. We jest worked. An' say, did ye see how grand Sam was doin' now?" she broke off jubilantly. "He wa'n't drunk only once last week! That couldn't any one made him do it only you. Seems how I never could thank ye fur all you've done," she added wistfully.

"But you do thank me, Patty, every day of your life," contended Margaret, brightly. "You thank me by just helping me as you do at the Mill House."

"Pooh! As if that was anything compared ter what you does fur me," scoffed Patty. "'Sides, don't I git pay—money, fur bein' matron?"

In New York Margaret went immediately to a quiet, but conveniently located hotel, where the rooms she had engaged were waiting for them. To Patty even this unpretentious hostelry was palatial, as were the service and the dinner in the great dining-room that evening.

"I don't wonder folks likes ter be rich," she observed after a silent

"THE PALE GIRL"

Did Not Know Coffee Was The Cause.

In cold weather some people think a cup of hot coffee good to help keep warm—so it is—for a short time but the drug-acts on the heart to weaken the circulation and the reaction is to cause more chills. There is a hot wholesome drink which a Dak. girl found after a time, makes the warm and the heart strong.

She says: "Having lived for five days in N. I have used considerable coffee owing to the cold climate. As a result I had a duache regularly, suffered from indigestion had no 'life' in me.

"I was known as 'the pale girl' and thought I was just weakly. After a had heart trouble and became very nervous, never knew what it was to be real well, medicine but it never seemed to do an thing. "Since being married my husband and I both have thought coffee was harming us and we would quit, only to begin again, although we felt it was the same as before to us.

"Then we got some Postum. We the effect was really wonderful. My complexion is clear now, headache gone, and I have a great deal of energy I had never known while drinking coffee.

"I haven't been troubled with indigestion since using Postum, am not nervous and need no medicine. We have a little girl and boy who both love Postum and thrive on it and Grape-Nuts."

The Transformation of Margaret

urvey of the merry, well-dressed young about her. "I s'pose mebbe Mis' agoon'd say this is worse than them automobiles she hates ter see so. An' don't look quite—fair; does it? I wonder now, do ye s'pose any of 'em ter thought of—divvin' up?"

A dreamy, far-away look came into the blue eyes opposite.

"Perhaps; who knows?" murmured Margaret. "Still, they haven't ever crossed the line, perhaps, so they don't—know."

"Huh?"

Margaret smiled.

"Nothing, Patty. I only meant that they hadn't lived in Mrs. Whalen's kitchen and kept all their wealth in a tin cup."

"No, they hain't," said Patty, her eyes on the sparkle of a diamond against the round white throat of a woman near by.

Margaret and Patty lost no time the next morning in beginning their search for the twins. There was very little, after all, that Patty knew of her sisters' movements since she had last seen them; but that little was measured and analyzed and carefully weighed. The twins were at the Whalens' when last heard from. The Whalens, therefore, must be the first ones to be looked up; and to the Whalens—as represented by the address in Clarabella's last letter—the searchers proposed immediately to go.

"An' ter think that you was bein' looked for jest like this once," reminded Patty, as they turned the corner of a narrow dingy street.

"Poor dear mother! How she must have suffered," murmured Margaret, her eyes shrinking from the squalor and misery all about them. "I think perhaps never until now did I realize it—quite," she added softly, her eyes moist with tears.

"Ye see the Whalens ain't whar they was when you left 'em in that nice place you got fur 'em," began Patty after a moment, consulting the paper in her hand. "They couldn't keep that, 'course; but Clarabella wrote that they wa'n't more'n one or two blocks from the Alley."

"The Alley! Oh, how I would love to see the Alley!" cried Margaret. "And we will, Patty; we'll go there surely before we return home. But first we'll find the Whalens and the twins."

The Whalens and the twins, however, did not prove to be so easily found. They certainly were not at the address given in Clarabella's letter. The place was occupied by strangers—people who had never heard the name of Whalen. It took two days of time and innumerable questions to find anybody in the neighborhood, in fact, who had heard the name of Whalen; but at last patience and diligence were rewarded, and early on the third morning Margaret and Patty started out to follow up a clue given them by a woman who had known the Whalens, and who remembered them well.

Even this, however, promising as it was, did not lead to immediate success, and it was not until the afternoon of the fifth day that Margaret and Patty toiled up four flights of stairs and found a little bent old woman sitting in a green satin-damask easy-chair that neither Margaret nor Patty could fail to recognize.

DAVID BRINGS THE ARK

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

NO SOONER was David established in his kingdom, and the Philistines overcome, than his thoughts turned towards the ark of God. Nearly a hundred years had elapsed since the ark had been taken by the Philistines, and although it was in the land from the time that the Philistines had sent it back in the new cart from Bethshemesh, and had remained in Kirjath-jearim, in the house of Abinadab, and he found it later in the keeping of Ahiah, or Ahimelech, Eli's grandson, yet it had never been restored to the tabernacle. With thirty thousand chosen men David went up to Baale, or Kirjath-jearim, "to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts, that dwelleth between the cherubim."

David, on this occasion, without asking divine counsel, imitated the method of the Philistines and sent the ark in a new cart. God's order was that it should be borne upon the shoulders of the Levites. All seemed to go well until they arrived at the threshing-floor of Nachon. Then the oxen stumbled, and Uzzah put forth his hand to hold the ark. "And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and he smote him, because he put his hand to the ark; and there he died before God."

Perhaps nothing is more trying to a man of God who has spent an immense amount of energy, time, strength, and money on some work of God, than to have a sudden check put upon the work, a manifest sign of God's displeasure, just when, in the fulness of his zeal, he has done all that is possible to him for the glory of God! It takes a long time to learn how our very best has to be crucified with Christ, and needs his cleansing blood. It seemed very disappointing, just as the revival of interest in the ark of the Lord was at its height, and the musical festival was enhancing the enthusiasm of the people, that the young priest, Uzzah, who was one of the principal actors in the scene, should be slain thus awfully and suddenly in their midst for no worse sin than steadying the ark of God, to keep it from falling when the oxen stumbled! Most people would think he had done right. What was his sin? It was the "evil heart of unbelief."

"David was displeased." He misunderstood God, showed his displeasure before all his people, and broke up the assembly without accomplishing his purpose. "He called the name of the place Perez-uzzah [the breach of Uzzah] to this day."

The ark was now carried as God had commanded: Men, not beasts, are to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord. Three months the ark remained in the house of Obed-edom, "and the Lord blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that he had." Tidings of Obed-edom's blessing reached King David, and at once his conscience was aroused. He "prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent." Then David said: "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites; for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God and to minister unto him for ever." And he called for Zadok and Abiathar the priests, and for the Levites, to sanctify themselves that they might bring up the ark. A second time he assembled all Israel for this great purpose. The preparations on this occasion were on a vaster scale even than before. There was a great variety of instruments, also a special department for song. One important thing which had been forgotten in the former, interrupted ceremony was the offering of sacrifice. "And David danced before the Lord"; he had put off his regal robes; before God he stood on a par with his people, and was "clothed with a robe of fine linen." When the ark was brought in and set in its place in the midst of the tabernacle which David had pitched for it, we learn that "David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before the Lord," and then "he blessed the people in the name of the Lord."

A Quarter of a Million Dollars Earned by a Girls' Club

Five years ago a club was started exclusively of girls. It had only one object—to make money. To-day the club has the largest membership of any club in America, while the money earned by the girl-members has reached a total of Two Hundred and Forty-two Thousand Dollars—nearly a quarter of a million of dollars.

Everything dear to a girl's heart has been bought and paid for through this club

Courses in college, wedding trousseaus, foreign trips—everything, in fact.

Now a new plan has been introduced into the club—an absolute offer for every girl to receive a regular weekly salary. There is no chance in it—it means what it says—a regular weekly salary for any girl who wants it. There are no dues in the club. The club pin, free to every girl, is a gold pin, set with a real diamond, made by Tiffany & Company, the great New York jewelry firm. Any girl can find out about the club by writing to

AFRAID TO EAT

Girl Starving on Ill-Selected Food.

"Several years ago I was actually starving," writes a Me. girl, "yet dared not eat for fear of the consequences."

"I had suffered from indigestion from overwork, irregular meals and improper food, until at last my stomach became so weak I could eat scarcely any food without great distress."

"Many kinds of food were tried, all with the same discouraging effects. I steadily lost health and strength until I was but a wreck of my former self."

"Having heard of Grape-Nuts and its great merits, I purchased a package, but with little hope that it would help me—I was so discouraged."

"I found it not only appetizing but that I could eat it at I liked and that it satisfied the craving for food without causing distress, and if I may use the expression, 'it filled the bill.'"

"For months Grape-Nuts was my principal article of diet. I felt from the very first that I had found the right way to health and happiness, and my anticipations were fully realized."

"With its continued use I regained my usual health and strength. Today I am well and can eat anything I like, yet Grape-Nuts food forms a part of my bill of fare."

Our Vows*

THE vow of the ancients, as among the less civilized nations of the present day, was usually dependent upon some merciful dispensation of Providence in return.

"I vow to give back to thee a tenth of all that thou shalt give to me," said Jacob, "if—thou wilt bring me again in peace to my father's house."

The whole nation of Israel vowed, "We will destroy all the cities of the heathen, if—thou wilt only deliver them into our hands."

Hannah said, "I will dedicate my child to the Lord all the days of his life, if—thou wilt give me a son."

Even Paul shaved his head in token that he had made a vow.

One of the most eloquent sermons of the late Dr. Hiram Eddy was upon the text, "Thy vows, O God, are upon me."

In a masterly manner, he showed that the mere fact of our being, and the opportunities presented by our environment, constitute an obligation to our maker. Without any "ifs or ands" about it, as the old saying goes, we are bound from the first dawn of intelligence and conscience to serve and worship God. Whether or not he grants us the desires of our hearts, is no matter. We are his creatures. He is infinitely good and wise. Our times are in his hand. We must take what he sends us, in perfect faith, and, whatever happens, still perform his vows. We cannot escape them.

Yet upon a fortunate granting of a petition has often hung the fate of a nation. One of the most able and gifted of the early queens of the Franks was helpless to win her husband over to Christianity until, after a run of particularly hard luck, he told her that the sacrifices which he made to his gods seemed to have no avail, and that he would now try hers. If victory perched upon his banners, he would promise to become a Christian.

True to his word, he pledged his life to the service of Christianity upon the turning of the tide of fortune, which presently came; and he proclaimed at once that all of his followers must likewise change their religion. It is doubtful whether the Christianity of edict is very deep, but in those primitive days no "probation" was required. The whole nation announced themselves as Christians in a day, and the result upon the progress of the world cannot be overestimated.

For us, in this enlightened age, to make a vow dependent upon God's granting of our will would savor almost of blasphemy. Whatever he sends us is for our good.

A prayer in Greek is called "a service with vows." Mr. Philpot, the first martyr who suffered at Smithfield, knelt as he entered the enclosure where he was to die, and began his prayer, "I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield."

It is related by the distinguished Dr. Calamy that a certain man named Murt had an only son who was afflicted in childhood with what seemed to be a mortal illness. The father and mother prayed in agony, and with vows of lifelong service, if their prayer might only be granted, for his life. Their petition was heard. The child lived, but poorly rewarded their love. He early went astray and soon became such a monster of wickedness that his mother lost her mind and eventually destroyed herself; while the broken-hearted father lived to confess that it would have been far better had the child died in his infant innocence. "We cry often," says a witty writer, "for that which would make us cry far more if we had it."

The Psalmist sang that he loved the Lord because he had heard his supplications and saved him.

This is well, but it is far nobler to echo Job's beautiful cry, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him," and, in joy or in sorrow, pay our vows unto the Lord, "in the presence of all his people."

What Will You Give To Be Well

I CANNOT tell you how happy I am that I have been able to bring health and strength to 30,000 women in the past six years. Just think! this means a whole city. It is to my thorough study of anatomy, physiology and health principles, and to my 12 years' personal experience before I began my instructions by mail, that I attribute my marvelous success. It would do your heart good to read the reports from my pupils—and I have done all this by simply studying Nature's laws adapted to the correction of each individual difficulty. If vital organs or nerve centers are weak, I strengthen them so that each organ does its work.

I want to help every woman to be perfectly, gloriously well, with that sweet, personal loveliness which health and a wholesome, graceful body gives—a cultured, self-reliant woman with a definite purpose, full of the health and vivacity which makes you

A Better Wife
A Rested Mother
A Sweeter Sweetheart

You can easily remove the fat and it will stay removed. I have reduced 15,000 women.

One pupil writes me: "Miss Cocroft, I have reduced 78 pounds and I look 15 years younger. I feel so well I want to shout! I never get out of breath now."

"When I began I was rheumatic and constipated, my heart was weak and my head dull, and oh dear, I am ashamed when I think how I used to look! I never dreamed it was all so easy, I thought I just had to be fat. I feel like stopping every fat woman I see and telling her of you."

I may need to strengthen your stomach, intestines and nerves first. A pupil who was thin, writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am. I am so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 pounds; it has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman."

"My old dresses look stylish on me now. I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. My liver seems to be all right and I haven't a bit of indigestion any more, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel so well all the time."

Write me today telling me your faults in health or figure, and I will cheerfully tell you whether I can help you. I never treat a patient I cannot help. If I cannot help you I will refer you to the help you need. Send me 10 cents for instructive booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly.

In Vision Splendid

MILLARD R. MYERS

"TWIXT optimist and pessimist,
The difference is droll.
The optimist sees the doughnut,
The pessimist sees the hole."

Both see through colored glasses,
Neither vision being true.
One fills the world with rainbows,
The other paints it blue.

The world is not all beauty,
Like roses after rain,
Nor yet like driven duty,
Whose labors are in vain.

There is a "Vision Splendid,"
By crystal glasses told,
That weaves through earth and heaven
One glittering strand of gold.

It measures dreams by standards
Of work which men can do,
And binds them into brotherhoods
To make their "dreams come true."

I Promise You:

Wm. Thompson,

That you save more money, and at the same time get a better stove or range for the money, when you buy a Kalamazoo, than you can get anywhere else in the world. That's my promise, and here's my hand on it! Will you give me a chance to prove to you that I will do what I say?

In the past six years we have sold Kalamazoo stoves and ranges to thousands of readers of this journal—saving them $5, $8, $10, and as high as $30 and $35 on a single purchase. But, that doesn't do you any good, unless you let me quote you prices and show you what we can do for you. Isn't it to your interest, then, to get our prices and catalogue? When you buy, you want the best stove or range you can find, and you want to buy it as economically as possible. You want to make every dollar count. Let me show you how. Write for our catalogue and prices, and then compare the Kalamazoo, in both quality and prices with the best stoves and ranges you can find sold at retail. That's all we ask—just a simple comparison. And it's to your interest to make it.

How You Save Money

You deal directly with the manufacturers. You buy at actual factory prices. You save all dealers', jobbers' and middlemen's profits.

You buy from one of the largest, most modern, best equipped stove foundries in the world—making nothing but the highest grade stoves and ranges, and you get all the advantages which come from manufacturing in large quantities.

You not only save from 20% to 40% in first cost, but you also save in cost of operation, in repairs and in durability.

You do not only save money, but you get a stove or range of extra quality.

You have no freight to pay. We send you the Kalamazoo freight prepaid.

You get a stove or range of the latest design, with all the latest improvements, which will last as long as any you can find anywhere, and you save one-quarter or one-third in the price.

You wouldn't think of buying land or hogs or steers or feed-stuff, without first finding out what the market price is. Why then buy a stove or range without finding out the manufacturers' prices?

Let me show you the difference between the factory price and the retail price. Use the coupon, or

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers

Mrs. N. K. Elmira, N. Y. Will you kindly tell me through THE MAIL-BAG: 1. Which was the first park system in this country? 2. What were some of the first methods in America of crossing large streams?

1. In old New England towns the oldest park is usually called the common. These commons date back to the very foundation of the towns in the very first half of the 17th century. Of these, Boston Common is the most famous and the largest of the earlier public parks. New York began Central Park in 1857, and has gradually acquired other recreation places. Brooklyn began Prospect Park soon after. Boston is the pioneer in developing its parks into one great system. In 1902 it included 3,548 acres of parks, connected by 23.6 miles of parkways, and a large bathing beach. 2. By ferries or ferries. Ferry-men received special privileges, and their fees were regulated by law. The ferryboats were propelled by sweeps or by a long rope stretched across the stream. A ferry of the latter type has been in continuous use at Windsor, Conn., from 1643 to the present. The other question sent has already been answered.

C. V. L., Zeeland, Mich., writes: "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, September 2, in answer to Frank R., Vera, Tex., says: 'The better rendering of the Psalm is 'utterly forsaken' and 'begging bread continuously.' Would not the last clause be still better rendered: 'His bread-begging seed?' That is, the Psalmist had never seen the righteous utterly forsaken nor his children, even if they had to beg their bread. This is the sense the Dutch (Holland) metrical rendering gives to the passage."

Reader, Centenary, S. C. 1. What is the white population of the United States, Great Britain, France, Japan? Which is the most powerful? 2. Is a graduate of West Point free to resign from the government service, or must he stay in the army a certain time?

1. The last United States census was taken in 1900. The white population then was 66,990,802. There were 8,840,789 negroes, 119,050 Chinese, 85,986 Japanese; 266,760 Indians. The population of Great Britain and Ireland of all colors in 1901 was 41,976,827. The entire population of the British Empire, including India and all dependencies, is put in the Statesman's Year Book as 392,846,835. Population of Germany in Europe, 60,641,278; France and colonies, 92,531,325; Japan with Formosa, 49,732,952. Great Britain and the United States are usually rated as the most powerful. 2. As the West Point student has received his education from the government and has at the same time received a pay, each student receiving $609.50 per year, he is in honor bound to give his services for some time at least in return. Write to your Congressman in regard to appointments. Send full name and address for reply to your other questions.

B. H., Orange, N. J. I heard a statement recently that Lincoln was an unbeliever up to a short time before he was murdered. Is this true?

No; he had a reverent faith in God and through his greatest trials always felt that God was working for the country's good. He worshipped in the Presbyterian Church.

J. W. C., Kearney, N. J. Do you believe that you can tell a person's future by the lines in the palm of his hand?

Certainly not. The future is known to none save God. Those who profess to read the future in the palm play cleverly upon human credulity. Books on the subject are useless, and their study is a sheer waste of time.

R. G. R., Reading, Pa. What is the size of the largest whales known to have been caught?

The "blue whale" of the rorqual family of fin whales is the largest and most widely distributed of all whales. Specimens have been caught that were eighty-five feet in length.

V. P., Peace Valley, Mo. Did Judas Iscariot partake of the Lord's supper?

Matt. 26:23 and Mark 14:18 answer the question in the affirmative.

H. W. S., St. Augustine, Fla. When a public officer is impeached by the House of Representatives, is he given a preliminary hearing by the House before he is tried by the Senate?

No; the following is the procedure in an impeachment case: By the Constitution the House of Representatives has the sole right to impeach; the sole right of trying the impeachments is vested in the Senate. The House, by a resolution directs the impeachment of an official, and appoints a committee to draw up the charges in a series called the articles of impeachment. If they are approved by the House they are presented to the Senate by a committee of the House appointed to prosecute the impeachment. Then the Senate summons the accused to the bar of the Senate. The Senate then becomes the Court of Impeachment. After it hears the accused official it sits as a Court of Justice. The committee of the House conducts the prosecution. The Senate votes on each article of impeachment. A two-thirds vote is necessary to convict. The accused is allowed counsel. If a President is impeached the Chief Justice presides over the Court.

Mrs. S. C. C., Salisbury, N. C. Why is Dan omitted in numbering the tribes in Rev. 7?

After the time of David, the name Dan, as applied to the tribe, vanishes. The name is kept alive only by the northern city. In the genealogies of I. Chron., chapters 2 to 12, Dan is omitted altogether; its genealogies had apparently perished. Little care would be taken to preserve the memory of a tribe which had left its original seat and given its name to a distant city, notorious as a centre of forbidden worship. It is not or "require." Such dread had stricken the Egyptians on account of the plagues that they gladly gave up their wealth, thus paying to the persecuted Israelites the withheld earnings of many years. Old Subscriber, East Hardwick, Vt. Will you give some particulars in regard to the "Tay disaster" which occurred some thirty years ago?

The Tay Bridge was built at Dundee, Scotland. It was begun in 1871. It was much injured by a gale on February 4, 1877. It was completed the following August and opened in May, 1878. Its

S. M. D., New York. Who was the author of the 119th Psalm? Can you give me the meaning of the twenty-two headings of that Psalm?

The 119th Psalm is a Levitical collection prayers, praises, sacred aphorisms, and declarations of obedience. Its original authorship is certain, but it is conjectured that Ezra was probably the author of it in its present form. It is the speaker represented, as testifying before the heathen world-powers to the excellence of God's Word and his blessings to those who trust in him. The words Aleph, Beth, etc., at opening of each section of the psalm, are the letters of the Hebrew alphabet.

R. R. McM., Muncy, Pa. Does Vancouver Island belong to the United States, and where does the boundary line come?

Vancouver Island is part of the Canadian Province of British Columbia. It is separated from the United States by a line drawn through the Strait of Juan de Fuca. The Canadian coast of Vancouver must not be confused with Vancouver in the State of Washington, where Vancouver Barracks are situated.

R. S., Dayton, O. What is the outcome of Police Commissioner Bingham's remarkable assertion that 50 per cent. of all the criminals in New York are Jews? Have his charges been substantiated?

No; he has publicly retracted and explained that the figures (which he admits were supplied to him from some unofficial source) were incorrect. His statement withdrawing the charge has been printed in all the New York newspapers. Read the article by Francis J. Oppenheimer the subject in The Independent of September

Delaware's Memorial to McKinley

ON the anniversary of the death of President McKinley, there was unveiled in the city of Wilmington, Del., a fine memorial tablet commemorating a brave exploit of the late President, at the time he was serving as a sergeant in the Twenty-third Ohio Volunteers. The tablet has been erected through the efforts of the McKinley Memorial Association, and a large number of prominent men who served in the war were present at the unveiling. The tablet shows McKinley on the firing line at Antietam, carrying coffee and hardtack to the soldiers. McKinley was then only twenty years old. He secured a team and wagon, filled it and drove into the thick of the battle, a conspicuous object to friend and foe. He was greeted with tremendous cheering. Several times he was ordered back, but again pressed on. McKinley afterward said that the words "God bless the lad" from a wounded soldier, alone paid him for the trouble and danger. "The result of this sort of thoughtfulness on the part of McKinley had a tremendous effect on the lines," said the quartermaster. This thoughtfulness for others remained a dominant characteristic of the late President until the day of his death.

It is a theory that the "ultimate constituents" of all vegetable and animal tissues are small cells. The idea was broached by Schwann in 1839. The lowest form of life is said to be but one cell.

Scene at the Opening Session of the Playground Congress in New York City

OUR SECOND PLAYGROUND CONGRESS

By HELEN GRAY

IN THE interest of one of the happiest and most hopeful movements of our time there were assembled during the five days, September 8-12, at the Museum of Natural History in New York, more than a thousand enthusiastic delegates and visitors, the occasion being the Second Annual Congress of the Playground Association of America.

Luther Halsey Gulick
President Playground Association

From all over the land came authorities on the subject of play; from far-off 'Frisco and Seattle; from Omaha, Denver and Chicago; from Boston, New Orleans, and Canada, to deliberate and take counsel together on the best ways and means for the furtherance of the cause of playgrounds.

It was an interesting convention from beginning to end. The uninitiated visitor received a share of his education in playgrounds before he entered the auditorium. There were models of playgrounds of every sort: municipal playgrounds, school playgrounds, country playgrounds, backyard playgrounds, courtyard playgrounds, tenement-house playgrounds, and playgrounds for children suffering from tuberculosis.

For the layman's benefit, it will not be amiss to define the word playground. Says one in good A-B-C language: "A playground is an outdoor space where boys and girls may play without restriction; where space for running and jumping, and apparatus for play, are provided; and where noise is not prohibited. It differs from a park in that the emphasis is put upon play and not upon the beauties of nature." At the first public session Governor Hughes was the speaker of the evening. He was presented to the Congress by Acting Mayor McGowan, after a few cheerful words of welcome to the visitors. From the start to the finish of his speech the Governor showed himself to be heart and soul in the playground movement. While congratulating the Association on the splendid work accomplished by them, he said it was only the beginning. He referred with feeling to those congested districts where children have no other playground than the streets.

Dr. Woods Hutchinson spoke from a medical point of view. His subject was "Can the Child Survive Civilization?" "Better a playground without a schoolhouse than a schoolhouse without a playground," he said. "There is practically no place for the child to exercise in. The modern city child has lost his most precious birthright—the backyard. That paradise of adventure, the alley, has been abolished. The lawnmower has descended as a blight upon childhood; lawns and flowers have taken the place of 'our yard.' Street car tracks, delivery wagons, automobiles make the streets about as suitable a place for play as the track of a railway."

The child feels this. Dr. Hutchinson illustrated his remarks with the story of a little boy whom the teacher at the beginning of the school session found sitting on the curbstone near by the schoolhouse.

"What is the matter, sonny?" said the teacher (the little chap had lost the certificate which secured him his seat in school). "I—I've—lost—my—my—ex-excuse—for—be-ing—a—boy—oy," was the sobbing reply. The last speaker on the programme was Dr. Luther H. Gulick, president of the Playground Association of America.

There were special conferences and committee and council meetings at which every phase of the movement was discussed. It was shown, in favor of playgrounds, that in those neighborhoods where they existed the number of juvenile arrests very largely diminished. The child must have vent for its spirits. "It is natural—it is right," said Dr. Gulick in his presidential address.

Many interesting papers were read at the sessions. Mr. Joseph Lee, an authority on playground matters, made a strong plea for more privileges for the small boy.

"Automobile hill-climbing contests are legalized," Mr. Lee said; "why should it not be legal for boys to coast on the streets? The automobile has its privileges, why should not the small boy? The child needs a playground because his growth is through activity, and because, accordingly, he will never grow up—or will grow up stunted and perverted, if he is denied those opportunities and objects to which his vital, instinctive and formative activities relate."

Mrs. H. Heller, Chief Probation Officer of Omaha, on "The Playground as a Phase of Social Reform," said: "The mischief that the boy does is not

A SERMON BY
Rev. Madison C. Peters*

The Motherhood of God

TEXT—Isaiah 66: 13:
"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

ROBERTSON, the famous preacher of Brighton, in his sermon on "The Virgin Mother," traces the rise of Mariolatry to failure on the one hand to recognize the instincts and affections of the heart which crave motherhood in religion, and the consequent attempt on the other hand to meet and satisfy the deep yearning of the heart for it. The hearts of men yearn for human sympathy, and so men took refuge in the mother, as the embodiment of divine grace and compassion. But there is no need that any one should turn away with heart-hunger from the God revealed in Christ in order to find motherly tenderness. Christ, who came to reveal the Father, was perfect humanity. He revealed in humanity not only perfect manhood, but perfect womanhood also. There was a true idea behind Theodore Parker's habit of addressing God in prayer as, "Thou who art our Father and Mother both."

The Divine Mother-Love

God resembles our mother—in his way of instructing us. Like our mother, God teaches his children by pictures. When God in Christ wants to show his yearning and sheltering love, he points us to the hen and her chickens. See the mother-hen with the young brood scattered around her. Suddenly they start at the sound or sign of alarm which warns them of some approaching danger. We see every chicken instantly looking eagerly and anxiously about for its mother, and whenever it sees her what a busy fluttering of tiny wings and pattering of little feet to bring it in haste to the trusted refuge! Then we see how the great wings of the mother-bird lift instantly to receive each little one, to throw over it the covering shield of her protecting love, and never does the hen spurn from her the feeble little chickens that fly to seek the shelter of her wings. Much less will the great wings of the eternal love fail to lift at the approach of the feeblest sinner who flies to God in Christ as his only refuge from the dangers of sin. Nay, but like the open gates of heaven those great wings of God will open to receive him, closing over as the impregnable bulwark of Omnipotence between him and his foes, and pressing him with an embrace of the divinest tenderness into that unspeakable comfort which can be found only close to the warm mother-heart of God. I am glad that God the Father has given us this picture of his motherliness in Christ, for we are sometimes even afraid of father, but never of mother.

An Undying Love

God's love, like our mother's, is never-dying—like the love of a mother to her boy. Wayward though he be, she will still love and cherish him in spite of every misfortune or disgrace, and if all the world beside casts him off, she will be all the world to him.

A celebrated minister was preaching to a great company of men in his own church, and in his sermon it occurred to him that if he told the story of his own life he might impress them; and so he said, "To my shame I confess that when I was young I broke almost every law of God except one, and the worst of it was, I broke my mother's heart, too. I made her hair turn gray before the time, and made her blush many times that she had given me birth. Then God met me, and for Christ's sake forgave my sins."

When his appeal was finished, there were scores of men who were deeply impressed and many ready to accept such a Saviour. When the benediction had been pronounced, his church officers gathered about him to say they had never heard him preach such a sermon.

When they had left, down the aisle there came an old woman. Her gray hair was like a halo of glory about her. Her furrowed brow was like the touch of an angel's fingers, her bent back was as if she were reaching forward to take her crown; and, when she reached the minister, she put her arms about him and said, "O my son, why did you tell it? You never were bad." And there she was, the same mother whose heart had been well nigh broken, and whose face had reddened again and again because this boy was her son. Her mother love had forgotten all his sin. And this is the picture of God. When he forgives, he forgets; and it is as if we never had sinned when once we take Christ.

Touched With Our Infirmities

God, like our mother, sympathizes with us. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe asks: "Did you ever see a little child rushing home from school in hot haste, with glowing cheeks and tearful eyes, burning and smarting under some fancied or real injustice or injury in school life? He runs through the streets, he rushes into the house, he puts off every one who tries to comfort him. 'No, no,' he doesn't want them; he wants mother, he is going to 'tell mother,' and when he finds her he throws himself into her arms and sobs out to tell her all the tumult of his feelings, right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable. The school is hateful, the teacher is hard, and the lessons are too long, he can't learn them, and the boys laugh at him, won't she say that he need not go any more? Now, though the mother does not intend to answer his foolish petitions, she soothes him by sympathy, she calms him, she reasons with him, she inspires him with courage to meet the necessary trials of school life—in short, her grace is sufficient for her boy, her strength perfects his weakness, he becomes tranquilized, calm and happy—not that he is going to get his foolish wishes, but that his mother has taken the matter in hand and is going to look into it and the right thing is going to be done." This illustrates forcibly the kind of help we are going to get when "in everything by prayer we make known our requests to God." God is not indifferent to and without sympathy in our actual experiences. "We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feelings of our infirmities," with human weakness and human want, but "One who was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."

During the last sad days of the great Rebellion a woman had occasion to see President Lincoln to plead for the life of one who was dearer to her than her own life. The importance of her errand made her nervous; but the fact that she must plead her case with the President made her more so. She had never seen him, but she had learned to honor him. In speaking of the interview she said that, as she entered the room where he sat alone, she trembled greatly; but when she looked in his face, as he rose to greet her, she forgot the President in the sight of the man—she saw that he was a kind-hearted gentleman, and though she could not forget that on his word hung life and death, she could tell her story freely to one who, in spite of all his cares, could be and was interested in her and her trouble. When we go to Jesus with our troubles and our wants, do we realize that he is a loving and sympathetic Saviour, who would no more turn upon us than would our mother? When we think of the last great day do we remember, as we should, or get the comfort in our hearts that there is in the truth—that we have an high priest that can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities?

Ways That Work for Our Good

God, like our mother, is nearest to us in our sorest needs. His great loving heart is always beating in tender sympathy for the sick and for the sore, the suffering and the sorrowing. There are no such watchers as God and mother. The best nurse may be overcome by fatigue, but a mother never slumbers or sleeps; if she does sleep it is with one eye open, watching and waiting for the first call. I have seen a mother sleep after watching for weeks a child whose life had all the while been trembling in the balance. The storms were beating without, the house trembled, but she slept on; but let that child make a turn on its pillow, or breathe a little harder than usual, and instantly she was awake to catch the first indication of the child's need. So Christ came to his disciples on the Sea of Galilee. He could sleep, though the ship rolled, the lights flashed and the winds roared. He could sleep through everything, until his disciples needed him, and at once he came to them—a God of power to give them deliverance.

God's ways, like mother's, we will find in the end to work together for our good. A younger brother, who was dearly loved by his sister, had been discovered in some misdeed and was summoned to his mother's presence. The sister ran to intercept for the wrong-doer, and, grasping her mother's hands, cried, "O mamma, don't punish my brother!" The mother looked down at her, half sadly, but with a tender light in her eyes: "Can you not trust me, dear?" she said. "Is he not my son as well as your brother?" And the girl went away rebuked, yet comforted, knowing that her mother's love was much greater than her own as her wisdom exceeded hers.

Sacrificial Love

Our dear ones are also God's beloved. Suffering and loss may be sent for their development, although it all his love compasses them about. Christ has bought them with a costly price. They are his. Can we not trust him to deal wisely and lovingly with his own?

If in the darkest hour you can trust God, as you would your mother, and hold to the belief that he chastens you for profit, you are near to the very throne of God and you will come out conquerors. "Thou shalt guide me by thy counsel and afterward receive me into glory." It is this "afterward" that God has in mind when he sends us into trial.

Such a faith holds the true secret of life. It brings the soul into harmony with God. How often the ways of God seem mysterious to us in this probationary and disciplinary state! It pleases him, as it so often pleased our mother, to conceal from us the ends which he has in view. It behooves us to have this patience and faith to wait until the "afterward," when the whole mystery will be unveiled to our sight.

The love of God, like a mother's, is sacrificial. To go up and down your great streets any day and you can see men prematurely old, their nervous systems shattered, many dying of extreme old age before they are fifty. Why are they working so hard at business? Not because they love money, or because they hope to spend it on themselves. Their wages, as a rule, are few, but these men are enduring all that fatigue of body and pull on the brain, in order that they may provide homes for their wives and their children, educate them and give them a good start in life, and when they have gone, to leave them something, that they, the children, may not have to work as hard as did the parents. In that battle of the home thousands of men are fighting every day.

The Crowning Test

But there is no love comparable to that of a mother's—a love that labors and never tires, a love that moves with glad compulsion, that will wear the fingers to the bones, and deny herself every comfort, and still goes on with a smile; and then when she gets her children settled she has just strength enough to die—we see it every day—the martyrdom of the mother for her children.

Yet this mother love is only a shadowy reflection of the sacrificial love of the Father as revealed in Jesus Christ. All the centuries of suffering and self-sacrifice fall short of the sacrifice which Christ made for our redemption. Oh, what it cost Jesus! Agonies which no mortal tongue has ever told, and tore his holy heart on the accursed tree; and all this agony, the agony of eternity and infinity.

WOMAN'S WORK FOR WOMEN IN INDIA

FIFTEEN years ago, the Young Women's Christian Association work in India is almost unknown. Of course, Christian women have always done more or less for Hindu and Mohammedan women in India. For instance, the Women's Missionary Societies of America, England, and other lands have done much for the women in the plantations of India. But not until 1894 was effective Young Women's Christian Association work started here. Among the noble Christian women chosen to inaugurate this great movement was Miss Agnes G. Hill, and two years later her sister, Miss Mary B. Hill, came to India to become the co-worker of her sister. Both of these ladies were born in Dayton, Ohio. From 1892 to 1894 Miss Agnes

The Beautiful Y. W. C. A. Home at Madras

Hill had done very effective work as Secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association in Toledo, O. In 1894 she came to Madras to be local secretary of the Association there. Soon the Young Women's Christian Association work in India assumed such dimensions that Miss Agnes became its national Secretary, and Miss Mary stepped into her sister's shoes and became the local secretary in Madras.

In the large cities of India and Ceylon, there are many thousands of European and Eurasian young women speaking the English language. There are so many native young women who know English and desire to improve their knowledge of it. Many of these are dependent upon the work of their own hands for a living. All work is regarded by the heathen as a disgrace, while in Christian lands the gospel of the dignity of labor is believed in by almost all.

The first great need for a successful Young Women's Christian Association work, after you have your secretary, is to let a place of meeting. It requires much money to get proper houses for the Association. The Hill sisters, first of all, encouraged the members in Madras to give all they could out of their comparative poverty toward this great object. It seems almost incredible that so few young enthusiastic women should give for the Young Women's Christian Association Home in Madras 30,000 rupees, but this they did. Miss Mary Hill then presented the needs of the work to the Christian people of England and America, and succeeded in getting about 30,000 rupees in England, and 30,000 rupees in America, so that the beautiful home in Madras in its spacious compound has cost only a little more than $20,000.

It is free of debt. The current expenses, however, are large because the inmates of the Home are almost all poor, and can pay but little toward the upkeep. Young Women's Christian Association Homes ought to have an endowment. There are now seven hundred members in Madras who pay one rupee a year each. This small sum does not suffice to pay the current expenses, so generous friends elsewhere have to come to the rescue. The Young Women's Christian Associations of other lands also support the secretaries sent out by them to supervise the work in India. America, England and Australia have sent secretaries and supported them. One assistant secretary, however, is supported locally in Madras.

At present there are about 150 Associations in India, with homes in Madras, Calcutta, Bombay, Lahore, Rangoon, and Colombo. In the beginning of the new century, a fine new building was erected for the Young Women's Christian work in Bombay. A wealthy Scotch lady in Rangoon, seeing the great need of the girls of Rangoon, gave a fine building to the Young Women's Christian Association of that city. Few cities in this world occupy such a strategic position as Colombo on the Island of Ceylon, just south of India. Ships from all parts of the world, carrying women of all nationalities and races, daily come into the harbor of this great city. It is strange that there is not a Young Women's Christian Association Home there. Miss Guitner, another American lady, Secretary of the Colombo Association, is now in America hoping to raise enough money to erect the needed home in this central seaport of the Eastern world.

During the fearfully hot season of India, provision is made for Holiday Homes up in the mountains. Ootacamund for South India, Lanaoli for Bombay, Simla, Darjeeling and Mussoorie on the lower slopes of the Himalayas for North India are the centres chosen for such homes. A beginning has also been made to have a Holiday Home up in the mountains of Ceylon, for the workers of Colombo.

Camps and Conferences on the American Summer Conference model are now held.

The beneficent results of Young Women's Christian Association work in heathen lands may be summed up as follows: 1. Many women are won to Christ, or are brought into closer touch with him. 2. In the various educational classes the young women learn that work is a blessing, and not a disgrace. 3. The young women, both native and European, learn to be self-reliant, and that it is an honor to bear their part of the burden of life. 4. A higher standard of womanhood is developed. 5. Class differences, which are such a curse in the East, are abolished.

Compressed into moments, for me! for me! Let us come nearer in faith, in prayer, in thought:

As though we every one
Beneath his cross had stood;
And saw him heave, and heard him groan,
And felt his gushing blood.

Take off the shoes from thy feet, thou standest on holy ground, for here God wrote the charter of the world's life in blood, even of his Son. Stupendous agony! Rayless abyss of sorrow! One of the finest passages in all history occurred when Louis Kossuth, speaking of his representative relation to Hungary, with the iron heel of the oppressor right on her burning heart, and while the ghost of the martyrs of his fatherland were stalking before his soul, said, "The woes of millions of Magyars are in my heart!" Yet how even this sublime posture dwindles off into insignificance when compared with him who, in a high and peculiar sense, borne in his great heart the woes of men in multitudes like the sands of the seashore, the leaves of the wild woods, or the clustered stars of the midnight firmament! When I see Jesus disrobing himself of the splendor of Godhead, and becoming the Babe of Bethlehem, my soul exclaims, "Wondrous stoop!" When I see him, "a Man of Sorrows, and acquainted with grief," in his pathway of benediction to men,

I say, "Amazing condescension!" But when I see him suffering keenly in spirit under the vile indignities which were heaped upon him, and for me, even for my sake, muffling up his anguish under scorns and scoffs, buffetings and blows, despising the shame, trampling under his feet the dishonors done him, that with his stripes I might be healed; when I see him yielding up himself to such an august agony that his heart was rent with a storm of grief spasms, I say:

Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my heart, my life, my all.

God has a mother's way of putting us to sleep. Amid all life's changes and discords, its toils and turmoils, comes to-day the picture of a dear face bending over us, while we seem to hear again the echo of a sweet lullaby:

Hush, my babe, lie still and slumber,
Holy angels guard thy bed;
Heavenly blessings without number
Gently falling on thy head.

The time will come when the day of life will be done; when the watchers will move silently about the house and the shadows will gather about you. Your arms will reach up to encircle some neck in a last clinging embrace. Your eyes will look up to catch the last tender message—unspoken because the heart is breaking. Lips always rich with words of love will stiffen into silence beneath the farewell kiss—then we will want God to hush us to that sleep from which none ever wakes to weep.

A Christian man was dying in Scotland. His daughter Nellie sat at the bedside. It was Sunday evening, and the bell of the Scotch kirk was ringing, calling the people to church. The good old man, in his dying dream, thought that he was on the way to church, as he used to be when he went in the sleigh across the river; and as the evening bell struck up, in his dying dream he thought it was the call to church. He said, "Hark, children, the bells are ringing; we shall be late; we must make the mare step out quick." He shivered, and then said, "Pull the buffalo robe up closer, my lass! It is cold crossing the river, but we will soon be there!" And he smiled and said, "Just there now." No wonder he smiled. The good old man had got to church. Not the old Scotch kirk, but the temple in the skies. Just across the river. How comfortably did God hush that old man to sleep! As one whom his mother comforteth—as a babe on his mother's bosom. When we are all being rocked into that slumber, may this be our cradle-song: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

A HOME FOR THE VETERANS IN GRAY

"BEAUVOIR," the old home of Jefferson Davis, is a big white wooden mansion half hidden behind trees draped in Spanish moss. It is on the white oyster-shell road that runs along the edge of Mississippi Sound between the towns of Biloxi and Gulfport.

I reached this big, hospitable house by trolley from Biloxi, a town a short railroad ride from New Orleans. Within the grounds, as I approached the gate, I could see a score or more of men, all gray-haired, all wearing gray uniforms, all with bent shoulders, all feeble of step. One of these came down the neatly trimmed path between the flower gardens to meet me.

"Welcome," said he, extending a trembling, wrinkled hand. "You are the ninth visitor to-day. Hundreds of tourists come and go here, but we—why, sir, we seem to go on forever. We come here to die, yet death moves extremely slow among us its wonders to perform."

"Just look at us, sir. Our combined ages would sum up something like three thousand years. There's old Tom Peters over there. He fought at Lookout Mountain. And let me introduce you to Zach Griswold; he was in it at Gettysburg. My name, sir, is Herman, of Hermanville, Miss. I lost most of my hearing at the battle of the Wilderness. So if you'll be so kind as to speak a little louder."

Such was my welcome at "Beauvoir." It is now known officially as the Jefferson Davis Memorial Home for Confederate Veterans.

The place is appropriately named "Beauvoir," for no more "beautiful view" exists anywhere along the Gulf Coast than that from the fifteen-foot-wide front porch on which the gray-clothed and hard-of-hearing veteran now asked me to be seated in a rocking chair.

On this estate Mr. Davis lived for many years after the war. In the rear of the great house I found a large vineyard which I was told yields an abundant crop from which the veterans in gray not only supply their own table with the luscious grape, but also sell many a basketful in the local market.

A few years ago the Daughters of the State of Mississippi and the Daughters of the Confederacy bought Beauvoir from Mrs. Davis and fitted it up comfortably as a shelter and refuge for feeble, friendless men who fought in the Confederate ranks. Hence it is that aged men in faded gray come now to be the lords and masters of the old place. They run it to suit themselves, and everything about the house and grounds shows that though the members of this self-governing community are all past the three-score-and-ten, yet many of them can still toil, each doing his task thoroughly.

One of the veterans sleeps in Mr. Davis's bed. Another sits at Mr. Davis's place at table. Others play chess and checkers with the men and boards that Mr. Davis used. And all seem wrapped in memories of the past, no matter what they are doing with their hands. The old men who are able to perform manual labor, make a little money for the colony by raising produce from various patches of land on the estate. Those who are not able to work at all are cared for by the Daughters.

On the grounds are no less than fourteen cottages and other buildings, most of which were occupied by the servants of the ex-president. The house itself is a large structure 75 feet wide by 65 feet deep.

"Beauvoir," the Home of Confederate Veterans

The rooms are all unusually large, even for a Southern mansion. When my guide ushered me into Mr. Davis's bedroom I said: "What are the dimensions of this room, exactly?" "Thirty feet square," he replied, "one of the largest sleeping-rooms for miles and miles around."

The house is built in three sections, the mansion proper and two cottages on the left and right known as pavilions, around an open square that Mr. Davis called the "Plazita." This name has clung to the immediate "front yard" of the place to this day. On the east side of the manor-house my guide took me to one of the two "pavilions" referred to. "Here," said he, "is where Mr. Davis first lived when he took up his abode here after his release from prison at the end of the war. We have for years called this the Hayes Cottage, because, after

Mr. Davis moved into the great house, his married daughter, Mrs. Joel Addison Hayes, occupied this little cottage herself.

"The use of both these pavilions," said my friend, "was tendered to Mr. Davis by Mrs. Sarah Darcy, a rich woman who was a true friend to Mr. Davis and his family. She owned all this property at the time, and she wished to share the comforts she enjoyed here with her friends, the Jefferson Davises. So Mrs. Darcy induced Mr. Davis to come here—and at first he lived in this cottage, not moving into the big house till later."

"At the same time, he used the cottage on the other side of the manor-house as his library or study. Come over there with me now and I'll show you just how he left it." We went to the "other" cottage, and there was some of the furniture left as Mr. Davis used—hardly a thing moved out of place.

Miss Winnie Davis used this particular pavilion, too, as a studio. On the wall hung two oil paintings, the works of the Daughter of the Confederacy, painted when she was only eleven years old, and left there when Beauvoir was sold.

Shelves containing rusty, musty volumes, reached from floor to ceiling—"just as Mr. Davis left them." There also was the slat-back chair and the heavy, straight-legged table that Mr. Davis used while writing his great book of the war. The books in this room, I was told, represented only a part of the very large library that Mr. Davis gathered at Beauvoir.

"It was in this pavilion, sir," my gray-haired guide said, "that he wrote The Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government. It was from the proceeds that Mr. Davis paid five thousand dollars as a first payment in the purchase of this plantation." He gave Mrs. Darcy his personal notes for the remainder. It was then that Mr. Davis and his family took possession of the entire estate. The notes, however, were never paid, for at Mrs. Darcy's death she willed them back to Mr. Davis and gave him and his heirs a clear and final title.

When Mr. Davis died, in December, 1889, Mr. Davis went to New York to live, leaving the estate of Beauvoir in the hands of a friend who kept it in order until it was turned into an old soldiers' home.

When the Daughters went to Mrs. Davis in New York and told her of their project for buying the estate, the widow said, "Nothing could be more fitting," and she sold them the estate.

ground," Miss Maud Summers attacked the comic sections of the metropolitan Sunday newspapers, which she said were lowering the standard of literary appreciation, and debasing the morals of the children in this country. These sheets teach children to laugh when boys throw water from an upper window upon an apple woman, or outwit an infirm old man. Humor has its place in the literature of childhood, and it would be well if gifted writers for children could be found capable of substituting genuine fun for the coarse, vulgar type now so prominent.

"The child learns in but one way: by reproducing in his own activity the thing he wishes to be. By means of the imagination, the child forms a mental picture, which he holds in mind and strives to imitate. Therefore the most vital purpose of the story is to give high ideals, which are reproduced in character. It is of the utmost importance that the story shall have at its heart a spiritual truth, or, in other words, that it shall have a right motive. This truth may be any one of the many virtues, such as generosity, kindness, hospitality, courage, heroism, and chivalry." Prof. Myron T. Scudder, of New Brunswick, N. J., and Prof. C. W. Hetherington, of the University of Missouri, took a prominent part in the discussions.

Secretary Henry S. Curtis reported one hundred and seventy-seven cities maintaining playgrounds this year. Among the officers of the Playground Association are Theodore Roosevelt, Honorary President; Luther Halsey Gulick, President; Jacob A. Riis, Honorary Vice-President.

The members of the Association were given an automobile ride through the congested districts of New York, where people live seven hundred to two thousand on a block. The playgrounds of New

It was good to see so many children in the full enjoyment of play. There were sand piles, see-saw, swinging rings, and other apparatus equipment.

The Congress culminated in a Harvest Festival at Van Cortlandt Park in which people of every nationality participated.

THE WORLD'S FINEST LIBRARY

FOR several years visitors to New York who took the ride up Fifth Avenue on the top of the horse and electric stages that run on that aristocratic thoroughfare have noticed under construction a great building of white marble on the site of the old Forty-second Street reservoir. The building in the classic style showed above its stately porch the words "New York Public Library." To arrive at its present nearly completed state from the time the site was selected has taken over ten years. Of course, many feel that altogether too much time was taken in its construction, but all now feel that this new palace of the books is a building of which all New Yorkers may well be proud, and one of the lights of the metropolis. Hitherto New York has had the Astor Library, on Lafayette Street, near Astor Place, used entirely for reference work, as none of the volumes are allowed to leave the building; the Lenox Library on upper Fifth Avenue, also a reference library, and numerous branch libraries from which books may be taken. It has had, however, no main central library corresponding to the Public Library in Boston. As preparations are already under way for shelving the books in the new building, all this will soon be changed. The library has the entire space on Fifth Avenue from Fortieth Street to Forty-second Street. In front of the building is a grass plot that reaches back seventy-five feet from Fifth Avenue's building line. The terrace is four hundred and fifty-five feet long. The building is entered through a pillared porch that reminds the beholder of some Greek temple. The hallway through the centre is eighty feet long and forty feet wide. The great arches of the vestibule, shown on the cover page of this week's issue, are fifteen feet in width and thirty-five feet high. Staircases of cut stone twelve feet wide lead upward to the second and third stories. The entrance to the staircases and the elevators are on the south side of the building on Fortieth Street. In the basement will be found the rooms for the

also be found in this basement. The furniture is to be adapted to the needs of the little folks, the chairs and tables being of diminutive size. Pictures dear to the hearts of children will adorn the walls. Attendants especially trained to the work will on certain days tell the children stories, illustrating them frequently by reference to the pictures, of which many will be brought out to supplement those about the room. The children will be guided in their search for interesting and helpful books, the librarians thus becoming coadjutors with the parents and school teachers in directing the child's mental development.

In the basement will be found space for the great room devoted to newspapers. The files will hold copies of papers from all over the United States and Canada, Great Britain, and the Continent. On the same level will be the library's own printing establishment and bindery.

Coming up to the first floor proper the visitor finds the periodical rooms, where hundreds of magazines from all over the world will be found on file; exhibition rooms and offices, and patent room. On the third floor will be found the large general reading room, special reading rooms for manuscripts, rare books on America, and the famous Stewart collection now housed in the Lenox Library, and rooms for pictures and prints. The New York Library has thirty-five branches in different parts of the city, and its readers number more than those of the public libraries of any other city in Europe or America, and with the improved facilities they will doubtless increase.

A NOBLE GIFT FOR EDUCATION

AMONG the many noble and judicious benefactions of Mrs. Russell Sage has been the endowment of her Alma Mater, the Emma Willard School at Troy, N. Y., with a fund of $1,000,000. A part of this money has been wisely used for new buildings. Instead of putting these up on the original site of the institution, in the heart of the city, they have been erected on a charming hill in the eastern part of the town, where there is abundance of space, air and light, and a beautiful view of the Hudson. It is an ideal location, and the great popularity which the school has achieved under the brilliant administration of Miss Anna Leach is likely to be much increased by this wholesale re-establishment.

Mrs. Sage's loyalty to what used to be known as the "Troy Female Seminary," and to the memory of Mrs. Emma Willard, the gifted teacher who made it famous, has been unswerving. She has been for years the President of its flourishing New York Alumnae Association, and had previously donated several gifts to the school. She has set a fine example in this respect to all other women of means. The virtue that exalts and clings to the institution to which one is indebted for education, is akin to patriotism, and the soul which does not know something of that fine fervor is sadly deficient in proper sensibility. Mrs. Charles

M. Pratt and Mrs. Thaw-Thompson have shown a similar devotion to Vassar College. The graduates of Mount Holyoke, Smith and Wellesley have displayed a most generous spirit as a whole—but all of these institutions are still pleading for funds. It is not likely that any one of them possesses a graduate with the large fortune and the free and independent hand of Mrs. Sage; but there are many as Esther came into the court of King Ahasuerus, at a crisis in the history of woman's progress. Born several years before Horace Mann and Mary Lyon, those ardent champions of popular and universal education, she, too, originated and carried out an educational scheme of perhaps equal value to our country. Her great personal beauty and her polished manners commended her to many who had hitherto manifested little interest in the development of womanhood, and to whom the plain, common sense methods of dear Mary Lyon could never have made effective appeal. The typical "society girl" was inspired by Emma Willard, as she had never been by anyone before in our land, to think, to study and to make the most of herself.

Mrs. Willard was not unmindful of the poor girl also. From the large income which her school brought her, she gave freely herself for the education of teachers, and she held up always a high standard of scholarship, which has been continued down to the present day.

The Emma Willard School has a good "seminary" course, from which students are graduated every year, and it also prepares girls for college. Miss Anna Leach, the very efficient principal, is a sister of Miss Abby Leach, the distinguished professor of Latin at Vassar.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE PROPOSED NEW AUDITORIUM of the Montrose Bible Conference at Montrose, Pa., will seat 3,000. The Conference this year was held in a large tent, which was packed with 2,300 auditors. Among the speakers were Dr. A. C. Dixon, Dr. Farrar, Dr. Gregg, Dr. Erdman, Dr. Swain, Dr. Jacoby, Rev. John Davis, and Major Cole. Dr. Townner of Chicago led the singing.

—Mrs. T. J. PHILPIN, El Reno, Okla., writes: "We are endeavoring to equip a Gospel wagon for colportage work, to take in all Oklahoma and Indian Territory, and scatter good literature, books, Bibles, papers and CHRISTIAN HERALDS. We need a light wagon, two horses, and harness. Who will help us?"

—MISS PARSONS AND MISS STEEL, two missionaries at Pandarpur, India, were attacked by an infuriated mob in the Australian Mission building in that city recently. The fanatical mob stoned the building. Miss Steel was beaten and left unconscious. Several arrests were made, and two of the perpetrators have confessed their crime.

—MISS AGNES SLACK, the well-known W.C.T.U. traveling missionary, writes from India: "The government monopoly of the drink and opium traffic is the weakest spot in British rule in India. It involves the State in making a large army of drunkards. Only one woman in every two hundred can read or write. The direct action of the government of India in its licensing laws steadily encourages the use of the liquor, obtaining thus a definite financial return. There is more open drinking among the high caste Hindus than formerly."

Imperial Peacemakers

ANDREW CARNEGIE has the faculty occasionally of employing very plain and expressive language. Writing lately to Congressman Bartholdt, President of the Interparliamentary Peace Union (now in session in Berlin), he said:

"There will be one man in Berlin while your Congress is in session who has only to speak the word to put an end to war. If the Emperor of Germany ever realized his manifest destiny peace would follow. He has it in his power to abolish war among civilized nations. All he has to do is to ask Great Britain, France and the United States to unite with him in declaring for peace. Neither of the three countries named could afford to reject this invitation, and the Emperor would have performed a service to the world unequalled by any human being that ever lived. I shall hope that the Angel of the Lord will appear unto him."

That the opportunity is there, as Mr. Carnegie points out, is unquestionable; but is there a royal ruler in all the world brave enough to grasp it? Human ambitions, unfortunately, do not run on parallel lines with the policies that make for the world's peace and happiness. Kings, emperors and presidents, too, trust in great armies and mighty warships rather than in the Lord of Hosts and his righteousness.

Men's passions, prejudices and habits are unchanged from age to age. It has been so long the habit of this unregenerate world to fight and shed blood, that the nations cling to the "ancient and honorable" tradition of war, even while they admit its futility for the settlement of any human difficulty. Violence is not and never was argument; anger and bloodthirstiness have never adjusted any dispute satisfactorily since the world began. War is an infinite multiplication of the crime of Cain and all the sadder that it is legalized and sanctioned by thrones, cabinets, parliaments and pulpits.

Great indeed would be the glory of one ruler establishing the principle of peaceful arbitration. In the beatitude: "Blessed are the peacemakers," we read between the lines the divine anathema directed against the makers of war, as clearly as though the words had been uttered by the Saviour himself.

Silly Sentimentality

SCARCELY a month passes without some notice in the papers of the death of a pet dog or cat, which has apparently caused as much grief as that of a human being. Often a funeral of great pomp and circumstance follows. In a recent case of the kind, an eleven-year-old spaniel was buried in a two-hundred-dollar coffin and is to be given a twelve-hundred-dollar monument, with his own precious little head carved upon it.

Now, a pretty animal is a delightful thing to have in a family. By means of it, children may be taught humanity and kindness, and may sometimes be attracted by the interest it awakens into fields of scientific study. But there is a limit beyond which sentiment becomes rank and maudlin sentimentality, and the wealthy people who allow their sorrow for their dead pets to express itself in two-hundred-dollar—or even ten-dollar—coffins, and proportionately expensive ceremonies and monuments, have far overpassed that limit. They have made themselves and their pets ridiculous, and instead of respecting their sorrow, the sensible public laughs at it, and properly calls them silly and absurd.

There is something truly touching and beautiful in the grief of a family who lose a faithful little pet, bury it in a garden plot, and place a board, or a common stone suitably inscribed, above its head. It is becoming that its virtues should be long remembered and often quoted in their circle. Charles Dudley Warner has made his cat Calvin almost a classic character. The dog of Ulysses is nearly as famous as his master, and the dogs of Sir Walter Scott have become historic. Many other similar pets are embalmed in literature and song, and Landseer has immortalized on canvas the noblest canine types, and that is well. But this mawkish funeral display over the dead pets of the rich, deprives of all its dignity and pathos the genuine emotion which doubtless lies behind it, and holds that emotion up to the smiles of an unsympathetic public. Let these afflicted ones search for some higher and more refined expression of their grief. In a world full of poverty and suffering such an expression should not be hard to find.

In this princely benevolence, the anonymous giver, caring nothing for the world's applause, has the inward satisfaction of knowing that he is strengthening the hands of those brave, consecrated men and women who are doing service at the front, winning souls for Christ. It is a gift which illustrates in the most practical way the principle of copartnership with the Divine Power which is directing the spiritual forces in the great battle now waging for the world's redemption. When we give ourselves to Christ unreservedly, we realize that all our worldly possessions are but a trusteeship, and that the service of personal character and conduct should be loyally supplemented by the service of our substance.

Our friend's magnificent gift, for which we heartily thank him, will prove a great blessing to the workers in the field and may be the means of bringing many into the kingdom. Though one may never be able to go to the front himself, each of us should strive to have a personal share in the work, for "he that winneth souls is wise."

A Dangerous Influence in Literature

LITERARY tastes undergo strange changes. For several years past, ever since Conan Doyle set the fashion with his detective stories, the romance of crime has been among the most popular forms of fiction. Crimes dark and terrible have been perpetrated and unraveled—on paper. Hitherto unsuspected depths of human depravity have been disclosed. Ingenuity has been tasked in devising new methods of law-breaking. Plot and counterplot have been evolved from the brains of skilful writers with morbidly active imaginations. Whole communities have been held in breathless suspense, wondering how the amazing tangle of wickedness could be straightened out, until some gifted being is produced who, being a natural-born mind-reader, a seer, a prophet, a diviner and all-around oracle, exposes the mystery smartly, amid applause by the gaudy multitude. Then the professional detectives, feeling slighted and cheap, sink into deserved obscurity.

One would reasonably suppose that this product of our literary Vidocqs would soon reach the surfeiting point; but the mill continues to grind out its gruesome grist of criminal stories in undiminished volume. For young minds especially, it is the poorest kind of rubbish as intellectual food. It is a class of fiction which, in the main, is a wrong impulse, an evil stimulus. If the old "yellow-covered" novel of the piratical and highwayman type had a bad influence on the minds of its readers and set many a young life adrift, the same can be asserted with equal emphasis of the detective novel, which invests crime with an atmosphere of mystery and adventure that is dangerously fascinating. Authenticated instances have come to light lately in which the clever criminal suggestions in these books have been carried out only too literally in actual life by persons who, but for such romances, probably would never have been tempted out of the straight path of decent conduct.

A Teacher of Hygiene

PROBABLY no one thing that the American Government has done for Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and other islands which have come under its protection, will be so gratefully remembered in years to come as the instruction given in practical hygiene by its officials, who have risked their own health and lives in an effort to introduce sewage systems, street cleaning, pure water supply and proper hospital methods. The quickness with which American health officers take hold of an incident epidemic and stamp it out has been a source of wonderment to the native officials and people of these tropical islands, who have ingrained the idea that to-morrow is a much better time to do a thing than now.

Within the last few weeks there has been an outbreak of cholera in Manila, brought probably from Chinese ports, as there have been a number of cases at Amoy. The fire chief got out four chemical engines, had them attached to the sanitary service and used them to disinfect houses from foundation to roof-tree. They proved a great success and the number of cholera cases shows a gratifying decrease.

The way Major-General Wood turned Santiago, Cuba, into a healthful town, after being a breeding place for yellow fever for centuries, and his effective cleaning of Havana while governor, is still fresh in the public mind. Wherever our army and navy have gone and our officials are given a chance to carry out their ideas there has been a marked increase in the enforcement of law and order and in the public health.

Aerial Navigation

MAN, having conquered the earth and the sea with his scientific inventions, is now setting himself in good earnest to conquer the upper air. He is experimenting with devices lighter than air and those that are heavier than air, and England, France, Germany, Spain and America are watching these experiments and are waiting with eager subscriptions to contribute to their success. These machines are of all shapes and sizes. The world's greatest interest is in the prospective success of the machines that are heavier than the air and fly like a bird. It looks as though two Americans had solved the problem of aerial navigation—Orville and Wilbur Wright, whose aeroplanes, the one under the direction of Wilbur in France and the other under the guidance of Orville in America, are astounding and delighting the world with their satisfactory experiments. Orville Wright broke the world's record for heavier-than-air flying machines the other day, after several very successful experiments at Fort Myer near Washington. The world's record for continuous flight had been broken a week before in France by Leon Delagrangé. In his last ascent Wright remained in the air an hour and fourteen minutes, and a little later the record for such machines in Europe was broken by his brother Wilbur in France. By a shocking accident in the breaking of a propeller blade, Orville Wright's airship was thrown to the ground, and Lieutenant Thomas E. Selfridge was killed and the inventor himself severely injured. And yet this unfortunate disaster will not prevent the success of aerial navigation any more than the bursting of to him at the close of the service." Chicago gave this minister a better reception than some of the New York City churches gave to the spies who were on a similar errand. Those churches in Chicago set a splendid example, for the Church of Christ is a mockery if it does not institute and retain the most vital hold upon the multitudes and carry its message of salvation to rich and poor alike.

The rich and poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all. (Prov. 22 : 2.)

Three Hundred Killed by Ignorance

An appalling mine disaster occurred recently at Rikovsky in Russia. The workmen called the mine "The Inferno," because of the prevalence of stifling gas, and they would only consent to go down into its workings at double wages. The explosion was not of great force, and a majority of the three hundred men who perished were burned to death or suffocated by the poisonous gas. It would have been possible to have saved all but about a dozen of these men if prompt measures had been taken, as it was fully an hour after the explosion before the flames broke out. During this hour, the rescuing parties waited new law which Georgia is about to pass. Christ so identified himself with his fellow men that he counted acts of kindness to the criminal, even in prison, as acts of love for him, and severely arraigned those who were not good to the criminal.

I was sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not. (Matt. 25 : 43.)

Playgrounds for Children

The people of America are paying singular attention to the health and happiness of the children. Important facts were brought before the second annual congress of the Playground Association of America, held recently in the Museum of Natural History in New York. Statistics revealed that 177 cities of more than 5,000 population maintain playgrounds at a cost of $12,000,000 a year. The grounds in 69 cities are supported by voluntary contributions, those in 36 cities by the Boards of Education, and those of 110 by municipal appropriations. It is held by good judges that the day schools monopolize from three-quarters to seven-eighths of the average child's time, and that the little folks must have a portion of that time in which to clap their hands and romp and play if our national health and civilization are to be properly maintained. The white plague is fed by bad air and indoors and we must have playgrounds to help fight this enemy. The sports of children in their contact with nature and each other are almost as friendly to their morals as to their health. Parks for the grown people and playgrounds for the children, especially in the cities, are as great a necessity for the welfare of society as a mercy to the people. The best type of men and women the tire of an automobile or the breaking of a car wheel will prove that kind of transportation a failure.

This is unquestionably the beginning of the practical navigation of the air, which will be employed in battle, in scouting, in dropping projectiles upon armies and navies, in the life-saving service, in carrying lines to wrecks, and in departments of the government. The airship will also be used in the practical arts of peace—in carrying mails and more than likely passenger cars for the public, to whom the "mile-a-minute" express train may appear as slow as the stage coach of olden times is slower than the "lightning express."

He shall fly as an eagle. (Jer. 48 : 40.)

Disguised Minister's Observation

It is a popular thing nowadays for the enemies of the church to criticise her relation to the plain people of the country, and insist that she is proud and selfish and that the "common people" no longer feel at home in her services, and many Christian people have joined in the criticism. The Rev. John Thompson, pastor of the McCabe Methodist Episcopal Church of Chicago, spent his August vacation disguised as a workman and attending services at nine wealthy churches in that city in a threadbare and shiny blue serge coat, trousers that were worn at the edges, a cheap cotton shirt and tie, old shoes and a black felt hat. The minister was so well disguised that his friends in the street car and on the street did not recognize him. He said: "I made the experiment to find what, if any, truth there might be in the charge that the workingman and the poorly-dressed visitor are not made welcome in our churches. I found, as I had hoped, that it was just the other way. In nine churches that I visited I found the congregation always attentive and in eight of the churches the ministers were cordial. In the ninth I was surprised to see how crusty the minister was, and I was practically repulsed as I spoke with folded hands for information as to how and where they were to descend. Ignorance of the inside of the mine and of modern methods of rescue was responsible for the fearful massacre. Next to intentional murder are the many deaths which are produced in all countries by an ignorance which might be avoided. In olden times, among the Jews, those who caused the death of others through ignorance had to flee to a city of refuge to save themselves from the vengeance that would overtake them.

And this is the case of the slayer, which shall flee thither, that he may live: Whoso killeth his neighbor ignorantly, whom he hateth not in time past. (Deut. 19 : 4.)

Georgia's Treatment of Criminals

The senate of Georgia passed the substitute bill, which is a new start toward convict legislation there. The measure will doubtless be passed by the house. This bill gives to the Prison Commission control over felony and misdemeanor convicts, and provides that leasing to private parties shall end on March 31, 1909. It is very encouraging to see what rapid strides the South is making in moral reform. It has driven the saloon from three-fourths of all its territory and eight-tenths of its population. It has abolished gambling almost everywhere and now it proposes to do the merciful as well as just thing in its treatment of its criminals, as expressed in the

in all callings are those who have left in their composition a large streak of the boy and girl—the deep instinct for recreation after toil. There is no doubt that part of the happiness of the next life will be an absolute freedom from care and buoyant exhilaration of spirit produced by the highest and divinest enjoyment, of which the unrestrained pleasures of our children at play are a type. The children had public playgrounds in the time of Christ and he makes this reference to them:

They are like unto children sitting in the marketplace, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept. (Luke 7 : 32.)

Labor Arbitration in New Zealand

The Prime Minister of New Zealand has just introduced a bill increasing the jurisdiction of the government in questions of dispute between capital and labor. In that country strikes and lockouts are prohibited under severe penalties. Every striking workman is liable to $50 fine and an additional fine of $5 for every week during which the strike continues and he has any relation to it. For a lock-out, the employer is fined $1,000 and $250 a week so long as the doors are closed. Those who aid or abet either the striker or the man locking his shop, in giving money or publishing any expression of approval, suffer a heavy penalty. The Anglo-Saxon has come pretty nearly to his highest expression in the New Zealand land law and civilization. It is likely that the New Zealanders are in advance of us in the adjustment of the frictions existing between capital and labor. Primarily the individual temperament and character must settle such disputes, but until there shall be a higher standard of honesty and unselfishness, the arm of the State must lay a strong hand on both capital and labor, and compel them to amicably adjust their differences.

Righteousness and peace have kissed each other. (Ps. 85 : 10.)

SINCE the holiday home for little city children was started by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fourteen years ago, there never has been a more enjoyable or successful season than the one just closed. Three thousand children have been entertained, instructed and helped during this period, when for ten long, happy days they have romped beneath the grand old trees, climbed the rugged hillsides and roamed the flower-strewn fields.

Among the speakers who have delighted the children and who have themselves in turn been delighted have been many persons of national reputation, and others prominent in official church and literary circles. Among them were: Rev. David C. Hughes, father of the Governor of the State of New York; Rear-Admiral Sigsbee, Commander of the Maine when it was sunk in Havana harbor; Rev. Dr. Belcher, Superintendent of the Five Points Mission; Rev. Arthur J. Smith, head of the Tent Evangelistic Committee of New York City; Mrs. Kate Upson Clark, the well-known author and lecturer; Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, and Dr. Madison C. Peters, whose stirring speech to the boys will not soon be forgotten. A message was also given by Rev. William Wilkinson, known as the "Bishop of Wall Street," because of his daily services among the "Bulls and Bears." Hon. Robert Watchorn, Commissioner of Immigration of the port of New York, said that the day of his visit to Mont-Lawn was one of the happiest he had ever spent.

Evangelist," and Messrs. Tullar and Meredith, who composed many of the stirring songs sung by the children, spent successive Sundays at the Home, leading the children most effectively in the song service. The "Glory Song" was never better rendered by grown-up congregations than by our children at Mont-Lawn.

necessity of watchfulness in all thoughts and actions, and as to the companionships. He was listened with the greatest attention.

One of the memorable addresses the season was made by Rev. Buckley, the venerable and distinguished editor of the New York Christian Advocate. At the close of visit he declared that it had been "treat of his life." He spoke of the portance of childhood, the right training of which was of far greater consequence to the nation than the condition of older people, as the future welfare of the republic must depend upon children. His address was full of practical illustrations, touching and dramatic, and the little ones as well as the audience of visitors were deeply affected.

Recalling his visit, Dr. Buckley his paper, the Christian Advocate, to this interesting incident:

One of the never-to-be-forgotten incidents the visit can hardly be described so as to portray its full beauty and significance. Mr. Alander sang:

Can the Lord depend on you?
Can the Lord depend on you?
Will he find you ever true?
Can the Lord depend on you?

He then said: "Now is there a boy here who can sing this tune and words, having heard only once? If he can, I will give him a suit of clothes. Dr. Klopsch shall have him measured and the clothes will be sent to him." O small boy, perhaps ten years old, with pale face and wistful eye, stood up and in a soft and very sweet voice sang the verse. He varied slightly in tune, but it was so well done that Mr. Alexander responded: "You shall have the suit." Then he asked if any girl "could sing the words and the tune without assistance. If there is one Mrs. Alexander [who was present] will give her a dress." A girl, perhaps nearly twelve years of age, who had a foreign aspect but not a foreign accent, arose and sang the test precisely, clearly and sweetly. These children there seemed to be three elements struggling for the mastery: a desire to succeed, to be commended, and to get the clothes. It was the most interesting single, double, scene of the occasion.

Irrespective of nationality or race, the children come and are taught genuine patriotism. It was thrilling to witness the flag drill, and then to hear these embryo voters pledge allegiance to the flag. All of them solemnly promised never to disgrace and ever to sustain it. Silent lessons of wisdom and goodness are taught in all the buildings. Dr. Klopsch is engaged in the manufacture of loyal American citizens.

The Home Side of the Business Man

NO MATTER how shrewd and sagacious a man may be in business, how hard-headed and slow to indulge in considerations of sentiment, he is almost always sure to have a soft corner in his heart where his loved ones abide. Sometimes it is a mother who holds the first place of his affections, and she is to him the most sacred influence on earth. Occasionally a brother has for his life the intense devotion of a lover, etherialized by the absence of passion that characterizes the more intimate love of husband and wife. A good man devoted to his wife and children presents to the world the home side which his associates in business would hardly recognize. In the business world he is a soldier on duty; he is bound to administer his affairs with discretion and in such a way that the best interests of many people may be conserved. If he is the head of a firm he does not forget that many little household fires are dependent upon the management of the business with which his employees are connected. Therefore, while he does not in the least cut loose from human sympathy, he must have a certain clearly defined policy and adhere to it with more or less rigor. When he turns the latch in his own door at night, the children run to welcome him with shouts and kisses; the mother smiles in the background and the whole man is transformed. He is affable, indulgent and benignant. No one has anything but confidence in approaching him with a request. Each knows that the utmost love and tenderness are wrapped up in that fatherly heart. Happy are the children who receive their first impressions of the love of the great All-Father from the man who stands to them in that relation here on the earth! Of course, there are men to whom this description does not apply. They come home carrying their business cares with them, fretted, perverse, and cross. The children retreat before the frowning countenance. The wife hesitates before introducing topics of conversation. Whatever is done or said in such a home, the man who does not realize how much bitterness follows in the train of his ill temper, will insist that it is wrong. Discouragement envelops the household in which the one at the head is usually gloomy and frequently unjust.

Happily, the ordinary man of business does not keep all the sunshine and the brightness for the people for whom he does not care. He brings his philosophy to bear on the daily trials, and he rarely comes to his home without a sense of gladness that it is his and a sense of mingled thankfulness and responsibility for those under his roof who shall be his representatives in the days to come.

If the business man have in him no capacity for the fight of life, no strength for resistance and no ability to say no on occasion, it is to be feared that his home will not be very stable. One of the gentlest but least successful of men used to come home, cut out the children's aprons and fuss about the house in a way that reminded one of an old hen looking after a brood of chicks. He would run to the door to give his wife another kiss if she were going for a walk. He was always fussing about after the family with overshoes and umbrellas if there was hint of rain. If, by any chance, he made a good bargain in the day's work, he lost its advantage by some needless occasion before the day was over. His pocketbook was at the mercy of every applicant, so long as there was anything in it. It is superfluous to say that this man, kind gentleman that he was, never succeeded in quite keeping the wolf from the door, or in making ends meet at the conclusion of the year. After his death, which occurred in his prime, his widow, with scanty means and a much encumbered estate, pulled herself together and brought up the children better than she might have done had their father lived. A man of the Harold Skimpole variety, or of the easy-going temperament of the famous Mr. Micawber, is apt to be a failure as a man of business, and almost equally a failure as a provider for his little home-world.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—THREE ESSENTIALS OF A HOME. You ask what are the three essentials in home life, omitting minor details. I would enumerate them as mutual love, entire frankness, and an income sufficient for the avoidance of debt.

—A GIRL OF FIFTEEN. Certainly a girl of fifteen may wear a corset if she wishes, but it should be a very simple affair, with few bones. Her frocks for everyday wear should be ankle length, though they may be a little longer for Sundays. A trained dress is unsuitable for so young a girl.

—ELMA. Why do you object to innocent friendship between little boys and girls? The trouble is that foolish older people put silly notions of beaux and sweethearts into children's heads. For my part, I think that boys and girls under fourteen study and play together to great advantage.

—DEEP HOLE. There is no doubt that if the custom of treating in saloons could be abolished, intemperance would receive a blow from which it could not easily rally. The saloon rests on a basis of good fellowship. Some substitute for the saloon, well lighted, well warmed and cheerful, with no intoxicants, should be found by the Christian church.

THE DELFT JAR

Not merely that the vase itself
Is beautiful upon the shelf,
And worthy a good sum.
She handles it with gentlest care,
And guards it as a treasure rare,

To which no ill may come.
An heirloom 'tis, and faint and far,
From loved ones who in heaven are,
Soft voices thrill around this jar
From lips that here are dumb.

A Word for Mother Goose

THERE is a world of wisdom in dear old Mother Goose. How her rhymes and jingles learned in childhood stick fast in memory! how dainty some of them were, and what a serene philosophy they conveyed!

Little Boy Blue, come blow your horn,
The sheep's in the meadow, the cow's in the corn.

Do we need anything more than that to unfold a picture before our eyes?

There was a man in our town who was so wondrous wise,
He jumped into a bramble bush, and scratched out both his eyes;
And when he saw his eyes were out, with all his might and main,
He jumped into another bush and scratched them in again.

In this immortal stanza there is subtly told the difference between the successful man and the man who is daunted by his first defeat. The man who never knows when he is beaten, jumps into the second bramble bush, and quite makes up for the attack of the first. This verse has been a stimulant to courage to many a drooping soul. If you happen to read it to-day, and you have an impression that you are down and out, spring up, brush your knees, and go straight at your second bush.

What about "Old Mother Hubbard, who went to the cupboard to get her poor dog a bone?" What about the dear "old woman who lived in a shoe," who had such a superabundance of children, and the other "old woman whither so high," who was trying to sweep the cobwebs out of the sky? If we have never yet met these ancient dames, they will surely come curtsying around the corner, and we shall recognize them, if not by the peaked cap and the red cloak and the tucked-up skirts, by the bright eyes and the merry smiles and fierce energy that has made each a personage. Blessings on Mother Goose! A rumor has gained currency that somebody is trying to abolish her. Never fear. It cannot be done. Mother Goose is not to be put down by any hard and fast well-meaning zealot who goes about proclaiming that two and two make four. There is an arithmetic in which two and two make five, and that is the arithmetic of imagination, to which Mother Goose introduces happy little children. If we are happy enough to keep the child heart till our heads are white, Mother Goose goes bobbing along before us with a skip and a laugh and a merry twinkle every step of the bright and sunny road.

Afternoon Calls

Afternoon calls belong peculiarly to life in neighborhoods where people have time and leisure to become well acquainted. In the city many women have found it convenient and almost necessary to have a day at home either weekly or monthly in order that their friends at a distance might not be disappointed when going to see them. Many visiting cards are engraved "First and third Wednesdays," "Mondays until April," "Thursdays until May," or something of the sort. To be compelled to remember the dates of a friend's At Home days is another burden on patient memory, although it may be obviated by reference to an address book and a marked calendar. In little towns and villages where people see one another often and live not too far apart, afternoon calling is more informal, more sociable and, on the whole, more satisfactory, than where one in meeting a hostess may also meet a throng of strangers. Reception days are well enough in their way, but not half so delightful as the leisurely dropping in of unexpected visitors for afternoon calls.

A PROMISE-KEEPING GOD*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"DAVID sat in his house." It was a house of cedar, the wood for which had been furnished by Hiram, king of Tyre, for there was no cedar growing in Palestine. Not only the wood, but the builders had been supplied by Hiram. It was not only beautiful, but enduring, as cedar is the most lasting of timber.

"The Ark of the Covenant remaineth under curtains." A house of curtains was to a house of cedar as shifting sands compared with a mountain of granite. King David lived in a palace, God in a tent. He could not endure the contrast. He desired that God should have as good or even a better palace than his own.

"Thou shalt not build me a house to dwell in." This was God's answer to King David conveyed through the prophet Nathan. Nathan was faithful in delivering God's message to the king, although he had agreed with the great quantities of brass, iron, stone and timbers. King David furnished the design for the temple, which was afterwards transmitted to his son Solomon.

Keeping the Promise

Now, as then, he is a promise-keeping God, the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Possibly we may not yet have examined nor counted the promises of God to us. A traveler in a foreign land was disappointed in using his letter of credit, and found himself with only nineteen cents with which to cover expenses until he should reach his next stopping place ten days later. He said: "I will examine my money belt again," which he did, when out of the folds fell a five-dollar gold piece! On two or three occasions since then, that same traveler has found an unexpected gold coin in his purse, which had been tucked away and forgotten. In every time of need we are sure of king in his proposition to build it. But God had vetoed it. David was not to build it because he had been a man of many wars. A prince of peace should build it later.

The People Greeting Christ With the Cry of "Hosanna to the Son of David"

David's Faith in God

"The Lord will build thee a house." Something better even than a cedar house—posterity by which David should reign forever. The son (Solomon) through whom this blessing was to come, was yet unborn, but David had faith in the God who thus covenanted with him. "His throne shall be established forever." In Christ, the son of David, alone could this promise be realized. During his life upon earth Christ was often hailed as "Son of David." Christ said of himself out of heaven in his "Revelation" to the apostle John: "I am the root and the offspring of David" (Rev. 22: 16).

And to the believing heart of King David God's promise was greater than the privilege denied of building a temple. But he was not obliged altogether to let go of his cherished plan. During twenty-four years to the end of his life, he was gathering materials for building the temple, which amounted in value for the gold and silver to $2,557,026,000, and there were also finding a promise of God which will yield satisfaction and comfort if we will in faith seek to recall it. Some of these promises are as follows:

Promise that our sins will be forgiven: "I, even I, am he that blot out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins." Isa. 43: 25.

The promise of God's presence with us: "If a man love me, he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him." John 14: 23.

Promise of comfort: "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." Isa. 66: 13.

Promise of direction: "I will instruct thee, and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go; I will guide thee with mine eye." Ps. 32: 8.

Promise of protection: "He is a shield unto them that put their trust in him." Prov. 30: 5.

Promise of peace: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee." Isa. 26: 3.

Promise of answer to prayer: "Call unto me and I will answer thee, and shew thee great and mighty things which thou knowest not." Jer. 33: 3.

Promise of wisdom: "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God . . . and it shall be given him." James 1: 5.

Promise of divine reinforcement: "Wait on the Lord, be of good courage,

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend. Margaret investigates the mills and sees many children at work. She informs Frank that she is going to live among them, and he asks if she will stay, saying her presence means everything to one at Belcourt. She thinks he refers to his brother Ned, and says, "No." She undertakes her work at "Mill House," but wonders why McGinnis does not come to see her. At last he says he has to stay away because he loves her. She finds that she reciprocates his affection and they become engaged. Ned returns to announce that Frank has been ill, and they are all coming home. Margaret and Patty go to New York to try to find the twin sisters of Patty, and call on Mrs. Whalen.

five years ago, for my little Maggie was just born when the twins come ter New York an' found ye. They wrote me how they was livin' with ye."

The old woman nodded her head.

"I know," she said. "I know. We was livin' over by the Alley. But they didn't stay. My old man he died an' we broke up. Sure, an' I'm nothin' but a wanderer on the face of the airth iver since. An' I'm grown old before my time, I am!"

"But, Mrs. Whalen, just think—just remember," urged Margaret. "Where did they go? Surely you can tell us that!"

Again Mrs. Whalen shook her head.

"Mike died, an' Tom an' Mary, they got married, an' Jamie, sure an' he got his leg broke an' they tuk him to the hospital—bad cess to 'em! An' 'twas all that upsettin' that I didn't know nothin' what did happen. I seen 'em—then I didn't seen 'em; an' that's all thar was to it. An' it's the truth I'm a-tellin' yez!"

It was with heavy hearts that Margaret and Patty left the little attic room half an hour later. They had no clue now upon which to work, and the accomplishment of their purpose seemed almost impossible.

In the little attic room behind them, however, they left nothing but rejoicing. Margaret's gifts had been liberal, and her promises for the future more so. The little bent old woman could look straight ahead now to days when there would be no bare cupboards and empty coal scuttles to fill her soul with apprehension, and her body with discomfort.

Back to the hotel went Margaret and Patty for a much-needed night's rest, hoping that daylight and the morning sun would urge them to new efforts and give them fresh courage, in spite of the unpromising outlook. Nor were their hopes unfulfilled. The morning sun did bring new courage; and determined to make a new start, they turned their steps to the Alley.

The Alley never forgot that visit nor the days that immediately followed it. There were men and women who remembered Mag of the Alley, but there were more who did not. There were none, however, that did not know who she was before the week was out, and that did not hear the story of Margaret's own childhood's experience in the same Alley long, long years before.

As for the Alley—it did not know itself. It had heard, to be sure, of Christmas. It had even experienced it, in a way, with tickets for a Bowery Mission tree or a dinner. But all this occurred in the winter when it was cold and snowy; and it was summer now.

The entire Alley from one end to the other was flooded with good things to eat, and with innumerable things to wear. There was not a child that did not boast a new toy, nor a sick room that did not display fruit and flowers. Even the cats and the dogs stopped their fighting, and lay full-stomached and content in the sun. No wonder the Alley rubbed its eyes, and failed to recognize its own face!

The Alley received, but did not give. Nowhere was there a trace of the twins; and after a two weeks' search and a fruitless following of clues that were no clues at all, even Margaret was forced sorrowfully to acknowledge defeat.

It was on the evening before the day they had set to go home that Patty timidly said:

"I hadn't oughter ask it, after all you've done; but do ye s'pose—could we mebbe jest—jest go ter Mont-Lawn for a minute, jest ter look at it?"

"Mont-Lawn?"

"Yes. We was so happy thar, once," went on Patty, earnestly. "You an'

me an' the twins. I hain't nev got it, nor what they learned m All the good thar was in me t come was from them. I thought if I could jest see it once, 'twould it easier 'bout the other—th can't find the twins, ye know."

"See it? Of course we'll s cried Margaret. "I should love there myself. You know I ow everything, too."

It was not for home, therefore Margaret and Patty left New the next morning, but for Mont-Lawn. The trip to Tarrytown and across Hudson was soon over, as was short drive in the fresh, sweet Almost before the two travelers ized where they were, the beautiful buildings and grounds of Mont-Lawn appeared before their eyes.

Margaret had only to tell that too, had once been happy little in years gone by, to make their come a doubly cordial one; and i not long before they were wand about the place with eyes and alert for familiar sights and sou.

In the big pavilion where their hungry little stomachs had been, were now numerous other little m-achs experiencing the same delat; and in the lovely dormitories v their own tired little bodies had r ed were the same rows of little ite beds waiting for other weary limbs and heads. Margaret's eyes moist here as she thought of that mother who years before had p ed over just such a little bed the pict ed face of her lost little girl, and of w that same little girl had seen it d had thus found the dear mother: ns waiting for her.

It was just as Margaret and F ty turned to leave the grounds that sy saw a young woman not twenty et away, leading two small child. Patty gave a sudden cry. The xt moment she bounded forward id caught the young woman by the shi ders.

"Clarabella, Clarabella—I just kw you're Clarabella Murphy!"

It was a joyous half-hour then n deed—a half-hour of tears, laugh, questions and ejaculations. At he end of it Margaret and Patty hurd away with a bit of paper on wh was the address of a certain city is sionary.

All the way back to New York ty talked it over—the story of the tws life during all those years; of how, ter months of hardship, they d found the good city missionary, d of how she had helped them and ty had helped her until now Claraba had gone to Mont-Lawn as one of e care-takers for the summer, and A-bella had remained behind at the r sionary's home to help what she cd in the missionary's daily work.

"And now we'll go and see A-bella!" cried Patty, as they stepd from the train at New York. "I ain't it jest wonderful—wonderful r think we are a-goin' ter see Arabella!"

CHAPTER XXXV

WHEN Margaret and Patty w home three days later ty were accompanied by a be-tiful girl, whose dark eyes carri a peculiar appeal in their velv depths. Some of the passengers in car that day wondered at such an pression on the face of one so you and so lovely; but when the girl r and moved down the aisle, they w dered no longer. She was lame, al in every movement her slender fo seemed to shrink from curious eyes.

Margaret had found her little frie far from strong. Arabella had be taxing her strength to the utmost, sisting the missionary through t day, and attending night school in evening. She had worked and studi hard, and the strain was telling her already frail constitution. A this Margaret saw at once, and c clared that Arabella must come ho with them to the Mill House.

"But I couldn't," the girl had c jected. "I couldn't be a burden to y and Patty."

The Transformation of Margaret

"Oh, but you won't be," Margaret had returned promptly. "You're going to be a help to Patty and me. The Mill House needs you. The work is increasing, and we haven't teachers enough."

"Oh, then I'll come," the girl had smiled contentedly—nor did she know that before night Margaret had found and engaged still another teacher, lest Aabella, when she got to the Mill House, should find too much to do.

Almost the first piece of news that Margaret heard upon her return was that the family were back at Belcourt, and that Mrs. Merideth had already driven down to the Mill House three times in hopes to get tidings of Margaret's coming. When Mrs. Merideth drove down the fourth time Margaret herself was there, and went back with her to Belcourt.

"My dear child, how dreadfully you look!" Mrs. Merideth had exclaimed. "You are worn out, and no wonder. You must come straight home with me and rest." And because Mrs. Merideth had been tactful enough to say "rest" and not "stay," Margaret had gone, willingly and thankfully. She was tired and she did need a rest; but she was not a little concerned to find how really hungry she was for the cool quiet of the west veranda, and how eagerly she listened to the low sweet voices of her friends in pleasant chat—it had been so long since she had heard low sweet voices in pleasant chat!

The thin cheeks and hollow eyes of Frank Spencer shocked her greatly. She had not supposed a few short months could so change a strong man into the mere shadow of his former self. There was a look, too, in his eyes that stirred her curiously; and, true to her usual sympathetic response to trouble wherever she found it, she set herself now to the task of driving that look away. To that end, in spite of her own weariness, she played and sang and devoted herself untiringly to the amusement of the man who was not yet strong enough to go down to the mills.

It had been planned that immediately upon Frank Spencer's return, McGinnis should go to him with the story of his love for Margaret. This plan was abandoned, however, when Margaret saw how weak and ill her guardian was.

"We must wait until he is better," she said to Bobby when he called, as he had been arranged, on the second evening after her arrival. "He may not be quite pleased—at first, you know," she went on frankly; "and I don't want to cause him sorrow just now."

Then 'twill be better if I don't come up—again—just yet," stammered Bobby, miserably, his longing eyes on her face.

Yes. I'll let you know when he's well enough to see you," returned Margaret; and she smiled brightly. Nor did it occur to her that for a young woman who has but recently become engaged, she was accepting with extraordinary equanimity the fact that she should not see her lover again for some days. It did occur to Bobby, however, and his eyes were troubled. They were still troubled as he sat up late into the night, thinking, in the dimly lighted room he called home.

JUSTICE TO THE JEW

THE current edition of Dr. Madison C. Peters's Justice to the Jew, which the McClure Company has just issued, is not the book of nine years ago, but an entirely new one. Fresh facts and figures have been added, and the enthusiasm which gave such force and conviction to the earlier work have increased with the years.

The heart-sickening persecution which has followed the Jew down the ages and in nearly every country under the sun, has kindled in many souls as hot a fire of indignation as that which inspired Dr. Peters when he wrote this chivalrous defense of a downtrodden race. All of such sympathizers will be glad of the ammunition which this book furnishes, and will probably learn much that they never knew before.

We all supposed that Columbus secured the means for discovering America from the generous but poverty-stricken Isabella, who for the purpose pawned her jewels. Dr. Peters insists that it was Santangel, a learned Jew, who came to the rescue, told Isabella to keep on wearing her ornaments, and put his hand deep into his own pocket.

It was a Jew, Luis de Torres, who first set foot upon the soil of the new world. The sea-quadrant, most helpful to the great navigator, was invented by a Jew, Levi ben Gerson; and Jehuda Cresques, another Hebrew, made the maps upon which Columbus depended for guidance until he struck the limits of the Great Unknown.

The eminence of great Jews in the fields of mathematics, invention, medicine, law, politics, literature and art is emphasized and fully illustrated; but their virtual control of the finances of the world, a point generally accepted, is here disputed. They are not, at least, Dr. Peters asserts, identified to any large extent with the infamous trusts.

Among the most interesting characteristics of this unique work are the mottoes which head the various chapters. They are from our best writers, and glorify the Hebrew quite to Dr. Peters's taste. One leaves the book with the conviction that not much that is worth while in the history of mankind has been achieved by anybody outside the ranks of the Chosen People. It should do much to allay the often unjust prejudice with which not only Europe, but even our own countrymen, regard them.

Bird hunting, coon hunting, deer hunting, bear hunting—Mr. Hunter knows them all. Especially interesting are his descriptions of the Great Dismal Swamp, and of a hunt with President Harrison, when he was the only man in the Ragged Island Club to decline a "bracer" before breakfast.

"ALMOST HOME"

IT IS but a homely illustration, just an everyday incident of childhood, but it contains a beautiful thought for those who are weary.

You had been out for a walk with father, and you were returning home at the eventide. The way was long, and becoming tired and sleepy you began to lag behind. Then you felt the reassuring pressure of father's hand as he said to you, "Come, cheer up, lad, die, we're almost home." Friend, the way has been long for you; tired and disheartened, you have been lagging behind. Just place your hand within that of your heavenly Father, and with the ear of faith you shall hear him say: "Take heart, my child, you are almost home."

The beacon light of home is just beyond, The pilgrimage of life is all but ended, And soon within the gate shall I respond

To loving greeting by my Lord extended, For I am homeward bound and almost home.

So dull has been the day, so dark the night, So rough the road, that oft my life was dreary, Nor any glad song, or guiding light

To make the darkness bright, the way more cheery, Soon these will be forgot, for I am almost home.

Oft, weary, had I fallen by the way, Oft had I blindly left the beaten track, But Father took my hand without delay, And whispered, as he gently brought me back, Take heart, my child, for you are almost home.

Almost at home, how swift the years are fleeting, Life's journey ended, then at home, the rest, Earth's ties united, what a glorious meeting, Loved one with loved one, in the region blest, Each year in passing finds me nearer home.

Almost at home, the evening shadows lengthen, Fair gleams the glory from the distant shore, Grant those, O Lord, my wavering faith to strengthen

That I may faithful prove, and then before Thy presence I shall stand, redeemed, at Home. Overy, Ont., Can. ALFRED W. HONE.

Clouds

"He spread a cloud as a covering,

IT MATTERS not, or here or there, For God himself is everywhere; When earthly things are swept away, Then will begin the heavenly day.

Sometimes he clouds the outer sight That we may see the inner light; And things of sense no longer stay The spirit on its upward way.

He oftentimes dulls the human ears, Then lends the music of the spheres; While from earth's discords we're set to hear diviner harmony.

The weary hands are laid aside To show that he will well provide; Will all our heavy burdens bear, And all our griefs and sorrows share.

The feet that falter on the road May yet be traveling heavenward; Though slow and feeble be their pace, They yet may soonest win the race.

And thus the clouds a covering are, To shield us in our journey far, From the hot sun whose fiercest ray Would hinder on our heavenward way.

"There's More Bread Here"

SHE was a wee bit of a girl who had seen much of the cares and sorrows of life, and on whom the heavy hand of poverty had been laid. She wore an ugly iron brace on a little shriveled limb, so that she hopped about from place to place with a bird-like movement. The sober effect of her veiled blue eyes was brightened by a sweet smile which shone out around her mouth.

She was entertaining a visitor, whom she loved very much. She danced of her plays and her dolly; of her swing and the playhouses; of the other little girls, who, with her, made up a merry company. "Ellen," said the visitor, "Do you like to stay here better than in the city?" "Yes," came the answer in a low tone, and after a moment's widening of the eyes—"There's more bread here."

This is an absolutely true incident of the Home for Invalid Children, Verbank, N. Y., which shelters fifty children. The work depends upon voluntary contributions for its support. Supplies of food and clothing are needed as well as money. The Home will gratefully acknowledge all contributions.

The Miracle of the Sun and Moon

By JOSEPH DEVLIN, M.A.

PERHAPS no passage in Old Testament history has given rise to more conflicting divergence of opinion than that which treats of the victory of Joshua over the combined forces of the enemy, when he marched forth to succor the Gibeonites, who had become his allies against their former compatriots.

The miracle of the sun stopping in its course has been accounted for in many ways. Science puts forward the claim that the gray darkness of the morning of battle was caused by a partial eclipse, or what is known as "sun-dogs"—that is, "mock" suns caused by the reflection of the sun's rays against the dense mists which lay over the valley. This phenomenon is often observed in northern latitudes, though in southern and oriental lands the appearances are somewhat different. A wheel of light is sometimes seen within a wheel, and other peculiarities caused by the state of the atmosphere at the time of observation.

Others propose to explain the so-called mystery in the clear light of philology, by putting what they consider the correct interpretation on the Hebrew original and giving the words a meaning different from that of the translation according to our version. Among these is the Rev. H. P. Lyman-Weaton, who in a recent issue of the Church Eclectic treats of the matter in a scholarly and original way. He asserts by the literal interpretation that Joshua merely prayed for the light of the sun to obscure itself for a time, so that the opposing foe would not see the small number of followers he had at command.

By a forced march during the night Joshua comes suddenly and unexpectedly on the enemy in the gray light of the morning. Taken thus by surprise the enemy, wholly ignorant of the numerical strength of Joshua's forces, the confederates fell into confusion, which was intensified by the bursting upon them of a violent storm of hailstones accompanied by the overclouding of the heavens. The five kings took refuge in a cave, while the main body of their army was pursued by the victor, who overtook and slaughtered many.

The 15th verse of the 10th chapter brings us to the end of this conquest: "And Joshua returned and all Israel with him unto the camp of Gilgal." But the narrative is opened up again in the 16th verse, and again concludes in the 43d with the same words, from which it is certain that there are two accounts of the same events. But where is the basis for the miracle in regard to the sun? In other words, on what does the narrative rest?

The answer is suggested by ch. 10: 13 wherein the historian appeals to the book of Jasher for confirmation: "I did not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day." Now the book of Jasher, Dr. Wheaton states, was a collection of poetic descriptions of battles and of the warlike deeds and heroism of the leaders of different tribes. In it there were flights of poetic fancy, allegorical allusions and figurative language. So if we are to take Jasher as a basis for the passage we must interpret the prose of the latter in a poetic spirit.

Dr. Wheaton points out that the verb dum is translated in our version "stand still." In its primary acceptance the meaning was "to cease," "to be still," "to be silent." Its kindred noun is correctly translated as silent, and was used in reference to the silent peace of the dead, the sheol of Hebrew faith. We find it in the Psalms with the meaning, "Unless the Lord had been my help, my soul had soon dwelt in silence" (Dumah). Ps. 94: 17. "The Lord did praise not the Lord, neither they did go down into silence" (Dumah). Ps. 115: 7. The verb, however, has been translated freely and in no two cases alike. Its literal interpretation in the original unquestionably was "to cease from doing whatever engaged the attention at the time," as "cease work," "cease praying," "cease talking," etc. In a word, it simply meant "to stop."

If we apply it with this meaning to Joshua's fine apostrophe to the sun, we are constrained to believe that he offered up the "petition for the sun to stop not its motion, but its shining. Therefore, the verse, "The sun stood still" can be construed: "The sun ceased shining"; that is, its rays were hidden by the clouds.

As to the remaining portion of the verse, "and hasted not to go down about a whole day," it becomes clear if we translate the verb bua according to its original significance. It does not mean "to go down," but on the contrary, "to come," "to appear." But the translators thought fit to put forward a construction in keeping with their interpretation of the verb dum, and so, through their error, bua is read as "a going down," instead of "a coming."

Thus, the original meaning of the words becomes simple, and obvious to the understanding of all. Instead of: "So the sun stood still in the midst of the heavens and hasted not to go down a whole day," we read, "So the sun ceased shining in the heavens and hasted not to appear almost a whole day."

Stripped of poetic fancy and clothed in its original garments, the language presents no mystery whatever. All is clear, simply going to show that God hearkened to the prayer of his servant. Joshua prayed that the storm and darkness might continue. They did continue until he vanquished his enemies, and victory rested upon his standard.

Committee Work*

PERHAPS the most striking feature of modern labor of all sorts is specialization. There are still a good many artisans who can make, each with his own unaided hands, a whole shoe, or a whole watch; but the vast majority of our workmen labor all their lives upon a single part of a shoe, a watch, a machine. The finished product, both in quantity and quality, is said to be, on the average, far superior to that manufactured in the old way.

Thus the work of the church must also be divided and specialized. In the complications of modern life, it is the only efficient way open to us.

But there is one great danger. He whose mind is set on a particular duty, need not always confine himself to that one. He may be on the Music Committee, but he may not improperly aid the Lookout Committee by hunting up and bringing in new members; and it goes without saying that the members of all committees should help the Sunday School Committee—and so on.

Still, the main current of one's influence should, of course, run toward the goal of one's own committee work. If you are on that for the prayer-meeting, pray unceasingly—and work besides—that the meetings may be more interesting and profitable than ever before. Impress it upon all you meet that the prayer-meetings are the life of the church. God may possibly give us sometime a better instrument for men's salvation than he has provided in his church; but until he does, we owe fealty to this great institution—his appointed means for saving the world. If our Society is not helping to increase the numbers and power of the church, it is all wrong. Therefore, urge attendance upon the prayer meeting as a sacred duty.

There is a certain invidiousness in singling out above others one committee for special praise or importance. When one of our great composers wrote a certain oratorio, he gave to one singer a very small part. This was so well done that it caused much favorable comment. The composer increased the part. The people were still more enthusiastic. Little by little the composer added to the share which this singer took in the work, until at last his was the principal character in the whole oratorio.

In the same way, by zealous and devoted labor, any one committee may make itself the mainstay of the whole organization.

Thus the Music Committee, which is sometimes undervalued, may, by active canvassing and judicious entreaty, secure from time to time such delightful solos, quartettes, or instrumental pieces, or may drill a few singers to lead the rest so effectively that they may change the whole spirit of a meeting, and greatly increase its fervor, until the dullest soul there shall "sing unto the Lord a new song."

Or the Calling Committee may so touch the hearts of the sick, or the listless, or the backslidden, as to bring in rich sheaves for the Master; or the Prayer Meeting Committee may devise new programmes which will attract and uplift attendants.

It sometimes seems almost wrong to have a "favorite" flower. A rose, a morning glory, a lily-of-the-valley, a chrysanthemum, a pansy, a columbine—each is beautiful in its perfection. One loves them all.

It is the same way with our greatest and best poets. All have written so many fine and satisfying lines (and also so many that are commonplace) that it seems almost silly to love one above another.

Thus let each committee magnify its office, in generous and loving emulation—all working together for the spread of our glorious Gospel.

The Christian's Guides*

FIRST, the Book—which none of us study as prayerfully and lovingly as we should. It is said that the knowledge of the Scriptures grows less and less each year among the young. The works of the great writers are full of poetic and significant Scriptural allusions, which, if affairs continue on their present downward course, as predicted by certain pessimists, will become utterly meaningless to the next generation.

Even the Sunday Schools fail, it is said, to instill any effective knowledge of the Bible into their pupils. Is not this largely because the good old practice of committing to memory has become nearly obsolete? The child who has not learned at least a dozen of the great chapters, so that they are imperishably engraved upon the tablets of his heart, is by so much the poorer—and in many ways.

One of our great sects has chosen for its watchword the wonderful 91st Psalm. Every member of its church is required to learn it, and to often repeat it, and such a practice is invaluable, for the Word is literally a lamp to the feet and a light to the path. "The siding for the newspaper," says Amos R. Wells in his clever talk on "Sidelings," "the main track for the Bible."

Matthew Arnold testified that he read daily a chapter in the Book of Proverbs.

"The name of the Lord is a strong tower. The righteous runneth into it and is safe," he quotes in one of his letters. "How delicious!"

Many others among our greatest men have fed thus daily at this rich and nourishing board—truly the Lord's table.

But an even richer blessing comes when we enter into an alliance with the Holy Spirit—an aid promised to every believer. The very thought that we are in the express presence of the ineffable God, as we kneel before him in prayer, refines and purges the soul. We know that he is everywhere, and yet in prayer we seem to feel upon us, as never in any other case, the spell of his divinity.

It was said of a good brother, long since gone to his reward, that when he offered prayer in the weekly meetings of the church, he forgot his surroundings. Every earthly thing seemed to dissolve around him and he talked with God, face to face.

"I shall never get so close to God again on earth," said one, after this man's death, "as I came when our dear brother prayed. He seemed to carry us with him to the throne, and the Lord seemed to bestow his spirit upon us all like a holy dew as soon as he commenced to speak."

And yet by persistent and whole-hearted prayer why should not all of us come as near? It is because we lack the spirit of Jacob—"I will not let thee go until thou bless me." Some have even said that real prayer is declining and that even among Christians there are those who doubt its efficacy. If this is really true, it may be largely because so many foolishly imagine that unless a prayer is answered in their own way it is not answered at all.

God answers our prayers always, and he answers right. Pray for your heart's desire, but always with the clause appended, "Thy will be done." He gives us what is best for us. Pray for the right spirit, for the Christian graces, for more likeness to God, more consecration—give thanks—and yet more thanks.

"More things are wrought by prayer," says the poet, "than this world dreams of," and one of the chiefest of its results is the spiritualizing and uplifting of him who prays. The Holy Spirit descends upon him—the Comforter draws near.

In addition you have the largest and best varnish factory in the world back of every can of JAP-A-LAC you buy.

We use special machinery in the perfect grinding of JAP-A-LAC, insuring a uniform, easy flowing varnish.

ALTRUISM

WHAT a beautiful home this world would be
If all lived here in unity;
If each would forgive another's wrong,
And smooth it over with a song.

If altruism filled man's heart,
And each would act a brother's part;
If an honest life each man would live,

The Smallest House in Britain

THE quaint old town of Conway, North Wales, boasts of the smallest house in Great Britain. This house consists of only two rooms, one above the other, and each is just two yards square. This place is over three hundred years old, and is a very curious dwelling place. The upstairs room, which is reached by a tiny ladder, has in it a four-foot bedstead and a washstand, so that there is none too much room for the occupant. Names of visitors ornament the walls. The present caretaker states that one tenant actually brought up a family of ten in this miniature house, though no explanation is forthcoming as to how the feat was performed. The present occupant, who has inhabited the cottage for seven years, pays a rent equal to $1.50 per week, and is very proud of the fact that she lives in the tiniest house in Great Britain.

The Two-room House at Conway

God's Promise to David

By MRS. M. BAXTER

IT WAS a time of calm; no war was raging; the king, who had so long wandered on the mountains and dwelt in caves, now "dwelt in his house, and the Lord had given him rest from all his enemies round about." His cherished desire to bring up the Ark of God to Jerusalem had been accomplished, and David was at leisure. The instinct of such men as Moses, Elijah, David, Paul, was to get alone with God and ponder the things touching the King. It was so with David. "See now," he said, "I dwell in an house of cedar, but the Ark of God dwelleth within curtains." This was his burden. In outward things he was better off than the Ark of God. It does not take much of comfort and luxury for the children of God, if their hearts are like David's, to discover that they fare better than Jesus did. "I have a comfortable bed; Jesus had not where to lay his head." But David meant something more than the simple expression of a sentiment, he meant business; and Nathan distinctly saw it, and said unto him, "Do all that is in thine heart, for the Lord is with thee."

Nathan, like a true friend, carried the matter to the Lord. God was not angry. Up to this time all the worship which had been offered to him originated in his own thought; he provided it for the good of the people, as well as for the glory of his name, and now it was sweet to see spontaneous devotion in the heart of his servant David. It was sweet also for David to know by a direct message that He who walked with the children of Israel walked also with his fallible child!

Then the message of God went on to speak of the future. "I have made thee a name, like the name of the great men that are in the earth. And I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their own place, and shall be moved no more. Moreover, I will subdue all thine enemies. Furthermore, I tell thee that the Lord will build thee an house." "When thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever."

There were two things David longed for; first, to build a house for God; next, that his might be a sure kingdom, and not, like Saul's, be taken from him. And now his two desires were granted in one hour.

David was overwhelmed. He "went in and sat before the Lord." How long he remained silent we know not, probably hours, and when, at last, he spoke, it was like Moses at the burning bush, or John before the vision of his Master's glory. "Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" He shrunk into himself with the consciousness of his unworthiness. When he turns from himself to God his tongue is loosed, his words flow. "For thy word's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thou wrought all this greatness, to make thy servant know it." David did not flatter himself that it was for his sake; no, "For thy word's sake." How unlike the vaunting of men who are without God!

"Therefore, now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established forever, and do as thou hast said" (I. Chron. 17: 23). He asks for no more. What need is there? He expects no less.

David is not full of curiosity to know which of his sons shall reign; he sees God's side of the question all the time. "And let thy name be magnified forever." God told him his name should be great as that of the great ones that are in the earth, but David is in no hurry for personal honor; God's name is more to him than his own. "Let thy name be magnified forever, saying, the Lord of hosts is God over Israel." Still God and Israel to the front, and self in the background. "And the house of thy servant David shall be established before thee. For thou, O Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house; therefore hath thy servant been bold (margin, R. V.) in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee."

FAIRBANK'S SOAP PRODUCTS

THREE POWERS FOR CLEANLINESS

Gold Dust

The woman who toils and drudges, bends and rubs, worries and scrubs over her household duties is misguided and behind the times. Gold Dust will relieve her of half the burdens of housework, do all the hard part of the task without her assistance, and keep everything about the house spick and span.

For cleaning anything and everything from cellar to attic, Gold Dust has no equal.

Don't use Soap, Naphtha, Borax, Soda, Ammonia or Kerosene. The Gold Dust Twins need no outside help.

For washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning wood work, oil-cloth, silverware and tinware, polishing brasswork, cleaning bathroom pipes, refrigerators, etc., softening hard water, washing clothes, and making the finest soft soap.

"Let the Gold Dust Twins do your work."

Fairy Soap

Fairy Soap contains no free alkali—it is just soap, pure soap, nothing but the best soap.

Pay any price you will, you cannot find a better quality of materials than goes into every 5c. cake of Fairy Soap.

It will not irritate the skin and stop up the pores like soap made from cheap materials.

Fairy Soap—the handy, floating, oval cake—is sold only in cartons and daintily wrapped in tissue.

It has the appearance, as well as the ingredients of quality.

Fairy Soap was granted highest possible awards at both St. Louis and Portland Expositions.

"Have you a little 'Fairy' in your home?"

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap

is a white soap made from fats and oils of a quality never found in ordinary laundry soaps.

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap (*n.r.) contains no rosin, and will wash woolens, flannels and the finest fabrics without shrinking. All yellow laundry soaps contain from 30% to 40% rosin, which is most destructive to fine fabrics and woolen garments.

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap (*n.r.) has all the virtues claimed for naphtha soaps, and will do better work. Naphtha evaporates when exposed to the air or put in hot water, hence its inefficiency; in Sunny Monday Laundry Soap (*n.r.) the dirt-starting ingredients last until the cake is worn to a wafer, and are equally efficient in any kind of water.

Sunny Monday Laundry Soap (*n.r.) will save rubbing, save time, save wear and tear on clothes.

*N. R. means "No Rosin." Sunny Monday Laundry Soap contains no rosin. Rosin is an adulterant which rots and ruins clothes.

"Sunny Monday Bubbles will wash away your troubles."

Questions and Answers

Mr. M. M. D., Jerseyville, Ill. Who baptized Roger Williams?

In 1638, Williams was baptized by Ezekiel Holliman, an Anabaptist from Massachusetts, and he in turn baptized Holliman and ten others. Williams, however, soon afterward withdrew from the organization, being in doubt as to the validity of the proceedings.

W. A. E., Rowland, N. C. The "seed" referred to in I. John 3:9, is God's word, which, while it continues to abide in the heart, is at utter variance with sin, and checks the desire for sin. It does not mean, however, that one cannot sin under any circumstances, but that while God's word abides active and energetic, and controls the life, sin has no dominion there. There are times when the new life may be less active or lie dormant, and then, as Luther said, "the child of God receives wounds daily, although he never throws away his arms."

J. D. R., Menlo, Ga. Is it right to give comic entertainments on the stage to raise money for church purposes?

Without knowing all the facts, we cannot judge of the case, further than to say that entertainments of the vaudeville character are out of place in connection with church affairs.

J. H. E., Westport, N. Y. If my wife owns a small house and lot and we have no living children, and if she should die, could I hold it or the use of it for my life-time, or only one-third of it?

If a husband and wife have a child born alive, then, even if the child die, the husband has the right to the use of all his wife's real estate during the time he survives his wife, provided she leaves no will. She may, by her will, give her real estate to whom she pleases. This is the law of the State of New York and of most of the States. There are States, however, where the law is not the same as in New York. A husband may give his personal property as he pleases, by his will. If he dies intestate his wife takes one-third, and his children or grandchildren, etc., two-thirds. If he has no children or other descendants, but leaves a father or mother, the widow takes one-half. If he leaves no descendant, or parent, but leaves a brother, sister, nephew or niece, the widow takes one-half, and the other one-half up to $2,000. If he leaves no descendant, parent, brother, sister, nephew or niece, the widow takes all. G. H. C.

J. S. C., Dover, Pa. Has the sign in the almanac called "up-going moon's ascension," or "down going moon's descension" any effect on plants, causing them to come up sooner in the one sign than in the other? Or, in shingling a roof, do shingles draw up more if put on in the up-going than in the down-going? Many farmers look much on those signs in planting and sowing.

There is, perhaps, nothing about which so many ridiculous superstitions gather as about the moon. You ask, for instance, "why seeds planted in the new of the moon will come up quicker and grow faster than those planted in the old of the moon? And why shingles put on a house roof in the new of the moon will continue to lie flat, while those put on in the old of the moon will curl up in the sun?" Other conditions being equal, there is no difference. Scientific men have made careful observations with the most delicate instruments, and have established that the phases of the moon have no influence whatever in such matters. SAMUEL PHELPS LELAND.

W. V., Grand Rapids, Mich. What is the bonded debt of New York City?

The net funded debt September 30, 1907, was $96,937,112.

D. N., Freeport, Long Island. Will you kindly explain what was the ceremony that the Catholics wished to perform at the recent Eucharistic Congress in London, and which they were advised by the authorities to omit?

The Catholics of London and the visiting delegates planned to have a procession about the streets near the new Roman Catholic Cathedral of Westminster. They were to march in full ecclesiastical costume, bearing their distinctive banners, and carrying the host. Fifty-one Protestant societies first protested against an official reception or the presence of a papal legate, Cardinal Vannutelli, on British soil as contrary to the law. Then the Protestant Alliance made an appeal to the government, urging it not to permit the law of the land to be broken, and placed the responsibility for any disorder on the home office, stating that such a procession as was contemplated was illegal under the Catholic Emancipation Act of George IV. The Premier, Mr. Asquith, sent privately to Archbishop Bourne, asking that it be abandoned. Mr. Asquith then made public announcement that it would be better to abandon a ceremonial the legality of which was open to question. The procession took place, but the host was not carried, but after reaching the cathedral the Italian Cardinal appeared on the balcony, holding the host.

J. S., East Palestine, Ohio. If the parents of a child born abroad were both born in the United States and are yet citizens, would the child be a citizen and would he be eligible to the office of President?

The question was referred to Lawyer G. H. Crawford, who sent this reply: "Such child is a citizen entitled to all the privileges of citizenship. The question of eligibility to the presidency in such cases has never arisen. The President must be a 'natural-born citizen.' In my opinion such a child would be eligible.

L. W. Y., Wilsonville, Neb. We read in the Bible that David was a man "after God's own heart." In what respect was he after God's own heart?

This question has often been asked, both by scoffers and the serious. David, it is true, had fallen into deep sin many times; but his struggles, his remorse, his repentance, his efforts at reparation—these also must be considered. His whole life, as one biographer says, was "the faithful struggle of an earnest human soul toward what was good and best—a struggle often baffled, yet never ended." This was the character of the man who was illustrious as soldier, shepherd, poet, king, prophet; who kindled patriotism, united Israel, and made it a great nation, and who drove out the worship of strange gods in the land. In view of all the blessings that came to the Hebrew race through David's reign; in view also of "the ask him for Christ's sake to give us strength to resist and overcome. Temptation tries every man. There is no sin in being tempted; the evil yielding and in encouraging its return. There are many very good people with some "flesh" which keeps them frequently in line with temptation, but divine reinforcements come to us when we call for them. In certain sense, the character may be developed and strengthened by these conflicts.

R. G., Bradford, Mass. In what year did cholera first appear in Glasgow, Scotland? Was it in 1835 or 1837?

Cholera first appeared at Edinburgh in 1817, and on February 6, 1832, whence it spread to other parts of the country.

A. P. S., Paducah, Tex. What is the name of the Prince of Wales, also the names of his children?

George Frederick, Prince of Wales. His children are Edward Albert, born in 1894; A. Frederick, born in 1895; Victoria Alexandra, born in 1897; Henry William, born in 1900; George, born in 1902; John Charles, born in 1905. This is the family record January 1, 1908.

W. G. S., St. Paul, Minn., sends the following apropos of a recent question in THE MAIL-BAG regarding Lincoln's famous temperance speech: "It was delivered before the Springfield Washington Society (Temperance), on Washington's birthday, 1842. The address was printed in the form by direction of the Society. Eugene C. Prohibitionist candidate for president, included in his excellent little book, Lincoln, the Man of Sorrow, published this year. You undoubtedly are acquainted with one paragraph of the speech: 'To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington are alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe, pronounce the name in its naked, deathless splendor; leave it shining on.'"

S. P., Sedan, Tex. We find in I. Sam. 8, that Samuel's sons are spoken of. Was he ever married, if so, who was his wife?

The name of his wife is nowhere mentioned in Scripture. He was married in his native Ramah or Ramathaim, and his sons were Abi and Joel.

A Religious Procession in St. Petersburg, where the Cholera is Now Raging

ONE of the severest epidemics of cholera in recent years is raging in several of the Russian provinces and in St. Petersburg. It is thought that the seeds of the disease may have been brought from the East by returning soldiers. At first but a few cases were noticed, but the disease rapidly spread until over one hundred and fifty deaths a day were reported, and the new cases would number several hundred. The grammar schools were closed and the pupils sent to their homes. The hospitals were full and two new ones were opened. Hundreds of physicians, aided by soldiers, are disinfecting the worst districts and supplying the people with food, in addition to medical attention. The United States government, through its consuls, has issued orders for a careful watch on all immigrants embarking from ports that are outlets for Russia, and for the disinfection of all baggage.

AMONG THE HEAD-HUNTERS OF BORNEO

By JAMES M. HOOVER

BORNEO, with its area of 288,000 square miles, lies to the southwest of the Philippines. The extreme northern portion is owned by the British; south of that is the independent kingdom of Sarawak, while the rest of the island is owned by the Dutch. The climate is hot and moist, the thermometer seldom or never getting below 70 degrees. It rains at all times of the year, but the rainy season begins in November, when the north-east monsoon sets in, and lasts till March.

On the west and northwest coasts are mighty rivers, which abound with varieties of fish, tortoises and crocodiles—the latter in undesirable profusion. Over seventy species of snakes exist in the country, but notwithstanding the fact that several of the varieties are poisonous, it is a rare event to hear of fatalities as the result of snake bite.

Borneo is the home of the wild men. There are timberless tribes living on the banks of the great rivers, and in the interior. They resemble the American Indians. A whole tribe lives in one house, which is sometimes an eighth of a mile long. The houses are built on poles about twenty feet from the ground, and the only means of ascent is a lashed log, which is drawn up at night to keep out intruders. The houses are built just one room deep. In front of the rooms runs a long narrow passage, in front of this a broader passage, and next to this still wider one, which is uncovered and on which they dry their rice. Each family occupies a room, in which they sleep, cook and eat.

The men are head-hunters for three reasons: (1) A man may not get married until he has taken a head. (2) The man that has the most heads is chief of his tribe. (3) They believe that these heads will be their servants in the next world. The heads are not only taken in war, but are also obtained by strategy. They prize most of all the head of a child, because the children never leave the house, and a man must be brave to go to a house to take a head!

When a head is first taken it is given to the women of the house, who form a circle and pass the head from one to another, singing a weird tune during the operation. When this is done they hold the head under one arm and stuff rice into the mouth: this they call adopting it into the tribe. It is then hung in front of the door of the man who has taken it, and when he wants to have a good time, he builds a fire under the head and smokes it.

The people have little or no religion, believing only in spirits, the following being chief among them: (1) Tupa, who created all living things. (2) Tenubi, who made the earth and all that grows on it. (3) Iang, the founder of the healing art. (4) Jirong the destroyer. The Dyaks build no temples and raise no altars. They offer sacrifices merely to appease the gods, and have no thought of obtaining cleansing and pardon for themselves. Their idea of the creation is as follows: "Rajah Gantallah had a soul, and organs of speaking, hearing and seeing. He made two birds, but nothing more. These birds created first the sky, then the earth, then a great river. Then they flew around the earth and to him and he answered; they cut him and blood flowed; sweat came through his skin. They named him Tanah Kumpok or moulded earth.

They also have a story of the Flood. There was a great flood in which all persons perished except a man named Trow. He made a boat of a rice-huller, and launched out with a woman, a dog, a pig, a hen, and a cat. After the flood he landed, and seeing that the earth ought to be peopled, came to the conclusion that many wives were necessary; so he made some out of logs and rocks and before long had twenty, and thus laid the foundation of the various Dyak tribes.

The part of the country in which our Methodist Mission has been established, is Sarawak, an independent kingdom, ably governed by an Englishman, Sir Charles Brooke. In 1840 the Sultan of Brunei gave over the country of Sarawak to Sir James Brooke, uncle of the present Rajah, and the territory has been extended until it now comprises an area of 58,000 square miles. The establishing of the Methodist Mission in Sarawak came about in this way: Seven years ago, a rich Chinese, a scholar, and a local preacher of the Methodist Church of Foochow, China, conceived the idea of establishing a colony in Borneo. He went to visit the Rajah of Sarawak, and informed him of his plan. The Rajah was pleased with the proposition, and lent him $20,000. An agreement was then drawn up, one of the chief clauses being that the first object of the colony would be the cultivation of rice. The Chinese then went back to China, and brought with him a thousand men, women and children, nearly all of them Christians and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to Sarawak, and settled them on the Rejang River. Three years of crop failures, with floods, disease and other disasters, reduced the colony to less than five hundred.

About this time, the Rajah of Sarawak came up on a tour of inspection. On being told the story, he decided that the best thing to do was to send the proprietor away, and let each man be responsible for himself. This was done and the aspect of things changed almost immediately. The people took a new interest in life, and began to work with a will. This was a little over four years ago, and to-day the colony is on a fair way to prosperity.

The Divinest Quest

TEXT—Isa. 55: 6. "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near."

YOU are all familiar with the chapter from which this text is taken. You will recall at once that the chapter abounds in sweet invitations and in blessed promises. It shows us that the work of Christ as a Redeemer permits us to give a universal invitation, an invitation to men of all classes, colors, and conditions, to come to Jesus and be saved. All are invited; salvation is free as the air we breathe; the promise of God's mercy is unlimited as the sunshine. None are excluded but those who exclude themselves. None are rich enough to buy God's salvation; none are so poor as to be unable to secure God's mercy. None are so good as not to need God's forgiveness; none are so bad that they may not receive God's forgiveness.

I call your attention, in the first place, to the duty of seeking the Lord. There are many reasons why this duty should be emphasized. Men are ignorant of God; nothing is more certain than the existence of this ignorance. God has taken the utmost pains to reveal himself to the children of men. All creation is a revelation of God. God has two great Bibles, the Bible of creation and the Bible of revelation. God's thoughts are written all over this physical universe. God's love is seen in creation and in providence as truly as in revelation. The bible of nature is as truly from God as is the Book of Revelation. The bible of nature reveals God as truly, though not indeed as clearly, as does the Bible itself. Preachers and others in earlier days made an enormous blunder when they placed the religion of nature in opposition to the religion of grace. Both are one religion. Nature is as much from God as is the Bible. He is the God of the universe. He is the God of providence as truly as he is the God of revelation; and yet the fact remains that men do not know him.

The Father, Friend and Saviour

One class of men think of God as a cruel tyrant, waiting for an opportunity to inflict, with his iron rod, his wrath on the children of men. Colonel Ingersoll once said to me, "The God I was taught to be the true God, was the God who elected a certain number of men to be saved, and all the rest to be damned forever." And then he said, "I determined to hate him." And I said, "Colonel Ingersoll, if God were such a being, I, too, would hate him." He added, "The God I was urged to believe in was a God who damned forever little babes because some one did not put a few drops of water on their faces." And again I said, "Colonel Ingersoll, if God were such a being, I would commend you for hating him; that is the God of the Middle Ages, and the God of some people in modern times, who still live in the theological atmosphere of the Middle Ages; but you know that the God of the Bible—the true God—is a loving Father, Friend, and Saviour." My eyes grew moist, and my voice tender, as I said: "Colonel Ingersoll, in the name of honesty, why do you not turn away from the God of superstition to the God of the Bible, and love him, and serve him as your Father, Friend, and Saviour?" Some hyper-Calvinistic theologians have misrepresented God as truly as have agnostics and even atheists.

Men Should Rightly Know God

Others again go to the opposite extreme, and they think of God as a bland, benevolent being who cares nothing for the sins of men. Their conception of him is represented by the French phrase, "Le bon Dieu," a good-natured, easy-going God, who is agreeably present when you need him, and comfortably absent when you do not want him. Such men are ignorant of God. There is not a man in this audience who would refuse to serve God, if only he knew God aright. In Ps. 9: 10 we read: "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee." If you have not put your trust in God, it is absolutely certain that you do not know God. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that men should rightly know God. Men are governed in their daily lives by their knowledge of God; our conception of Godhood will determine our ideal of manhood. Men become, to some degree, like the gods they worship. Some heathen people are coarse, cruel, and tyrannical, because they worship coarse, cruel, brutal, and tyrannical gods. You cannot possibly expect a man to be better than his god. If the god is bad, the man is certain to be worse; if the god is good, the man is likely to make some approach toward goodness. In Ps. 115: 8, we have the words regarding heathen gods and their worshipers: "They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them." It is then of the utmost importance that we have correct ideas concerning God, in order that we may make some approach toward correct actions in our daily lives.

Bear in mind also that, if we are to know God, we must seek for that knowledge. Religion is marked by common sense in all its relations. We have, unfortunately, often removed religion quite too widely from the sphere and atmosphere of sound common sense. No man ever becomes religious accidentally. The laws of the natural world are also the laws of the spiritual world. There is not one set of laws for this life and another for the life that is to come.

Live in Harmony With Spiritual Laws

Great moral laws sweep through the universe. If our lives are fashioned in harmony with these laws, they will bear us on to success here, and to glory hereafter; if our lives are in opposition to these laws, they will destroy us both for this life and for that which is to come. If men want learning, they seek it. If they desire wealth, they adopt the means which, according to ordinary laws, are sure to eventuate in securing wealth. What would you think of a man who desired learning, sitting down in idleness, neglecting all study, refusing to go to college, saying he was just waiting until he became learned? What a fool! And yet, all over this church this morning, there are men equally foolish in regard to religious things. What are you waiting for? You say you are not prepared to confess Christ and to join the church. Were you prepared last year? No. Will you be prepared next year, if you remain as you are? No. When are you going to be prepared? What steps are you taking to be prepared? What are you waiting for? In the name of common sense, I ask you; what are you waiting for? Is God going to give you a moral earthquake? Is God going to speak to you by an audible voice from heaven? For what are you waiting? Is he not speaking now by the still small voice of his Spirit? Why do you not listen? Why do you not move out along the line of God's appointment? "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found."

This leads me to speak, in the second place, of the right time for seeking the Lord. Again this morning, as last Sunday morning, I must remind you that youth is God's chosen time. Great and precious promises are made to those who seek the Lord in youth: "I love them that love me; and those that seek me early shall find me." Solemn commands are given to us all to seek God in our youth: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." We know that most conversions do occur in comparatively early youth. Converted boys and girls are the hope of the church. I should feel that my ministry was going out in silence, darkness, and hopelessness were it not for the large numbers of young men and women who are coming forward in this church to bear its burdens, to share its honors, and to perform its duties. I cannot too strongly emphasize the importance of urging our children to come to God in their early youth. Some of you parents, I fear, are standing in the way of your children. You ought to be very grateful that we do not let you alone until we feel that we have done our duty. If we, as pastors, were indifferent to you and your children, you would have occasion for legitimate fault-finding; but when we show a tender solicitude, you should show an appreciative gratitude. We shall not unduly interfere; we shall leave you to the responsibility which belongs to you as fathers and mothers. Some of you may live to regret the course you choose to pursue.

Win Stars for Your Crown

A good time to seek God is a time of religious revival, whatever the season of the year may be. Then, with special meaning, God's word comes to us, "Oh, taste and see that the Lord is good." Then we hear afresh the invitation of Moses to Hobab, "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good." God's people are then aroused; they are then extending the invitations of the Gospel; they are then quickened in their spiritual life; and they are ready to echo the words of Christ's invitation to all who will listen to their voice. I beseech you, men and women who know God, that you repeat these invitations. O men and women, sow the seed, speak the word, give the invitation! For your own soul's sake and for the sake of Christ, win stars for your crown. I wonder whether there is any one in this audience who is a true Christian and who has never won a soul to Christ. Can you recall any one whom you have won? You have never known such joy as that of winning souls to Christ.

It is a good time to seek the Lord when the Spirit strives. We then hear the voice of Christ, saying, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock." We then hear the Spirit saying, "To-day if ye will hear his voice harden not your heart." We hear the voice of inspiration saying, "Quench not the Spirit." There is a time when God will not be near, in the sense in which he is near at other times. There is, without doubt, a time when the Spirit will not strive, as he strives at other times. There is a day of grace in religion, in education, in business, and in social life; and if you neglect that day of grace you never will have an education, you never will have social recognition as you might have had it, and you never will have business success such as you might have secured. There is nothing arbitrary in God in relation to this matter of a divine call and the passing away of the day of grace. I met a man a few weeks ago who said, "I would give all, and ten times more than I now own, if I only had received a college education. My father offered it to me, my mother wept tears of sorrow because I refused father's offer."

The Calling of God's Voice

Now it is too late, the day of educational grace is over." He was right. In the same spirit, according to similar natural and divine law, your day for religious grace will be over. You harden your heart; you close your ears, and the voice of God's Spirit will neither be heard nor felt. I have been in the heart of London at midday when the bells of St. Paul's rang; but their sound was not heard. The roar in the streets of that modern Babylon silenced the voice of the bells of St. Paul's. But I have been in the city near midnight when the bells rang, and their music echoed sweetly all over the old city. God's voice will call, but the engagements of life and the pleasures of the world will muffle the sound so that you will not hear the divine voice. For the moment, nothing is said about God's power to withdraw his call. That truth is not denied. It is a terribly solemn truth. You can say, "No, no, no," to God's Spirit, and he will take you at your word, man, woman, child, and you will go through life with a stone instead of a heart in your bosom. But apart from that side of it, this truth has its illustration along the line of strict natural law, without the slightest doubt. If we are to find God, we must seek God. That is the rule everywhere in life; religion is no exception.

The Selfishness of Sin

This leads me to close by calling your attention to the right way of seeking the Lord. You are to seek him in the forsaking of sin. The next verse to my text gives us that idea: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Assuredly the prodigal may come home, but he must leave the swine behind him. He may come with his tattered garments, and with the stench of the pigsty on his faded robe, but the pigs he leaves behind. You must forsake your sins. Your heart must be washed and cleansed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. How our hearts ache, as we think of a recent trial in our courts! If only those men had become Christians when they were boys! Oh, the sorrow, the heartache, which ungodly boys cause their mothers! Think of that white-haired mother, in trying to save her boy's life, revealing her heart, telling her family secrets! It is enough to make an angel weep. Sinners are selfish; they are brutal. Godless boys are willing to break their mothers' hearts, and bring their father's gray hairs down with sorrow to the grave. If a man had a spark of manliness in him, he would live a decent life, and not break his mother's heart, and not dishonor his family name, and not suffuse the cheeks of

KENTUCKY'S MOUNTAIN COLLEGE

By DR. EMMETT McCORKLE

Governor Willson of Kentucky

WHEN the new college on the Punch-eon Camp Stream in Breathitt County, Ky., built by the Soul Winners' League, was dedicated lately to the noble object of Christian education, a great crowd of Highlanders from several counties assembled, many doubtless to see and hear the Governor of Kentucky. The multitude was too large for the auditorium of the college, which will seat three hundred or more, so the exercises were held have a chance to do things. We are full of sympathy for your condition. "I am told that almost every other boy here cannot read. But temples like that school standing yonder upon that hill, will cure that condition. We are all playing in the great game of life, and there are certain rules which govern that game; one of them being that no one shall interfere with the rights and happiness of others around him, and that we are all made free and equal, one with the other. You, my people, have a name that is undeserved. Your country is heralded all over as the place of bitter strife. I am not speaking to you from a political standpoint. I have no political aspirations. I would not have you forget the great sacrifice that is being made in your behalf by these good people who have come into your midst to give you knowledge and learning. Do you know that these men and women with high educations, work here among you in these schools for salaries by the month, which would be considered by them small for a week's labor elsewhere? The secret of this is, that they want to do good, and be of use among their fellow men. "Give a smile to your neighbor as you pass. You are poor, but give of what you have. Spread the smiles and sunshine around you, just as you would spread butter on your bread. The hills around you rant has done good, and he will do more good. Are your American children to grow up without being able to read? Won't you say, 'Not if I can help it?' "You are the true Anglo-Saxon blood, here in the hills. The time may come when you may prove to be the anchor-stone of our great government. No truer American blood flows through the veins of man than courses through yours. But your children won't have a show, unless you give them a chance for an education. There is no more blessed thought than to be able to bring help to them. This school here is the hen, and in after years her chickens will come back to her, as full-grown and competent ones." The Governor closed amid cheers and hand-clapping. Dr. Guerrant arose and asked the gathering to sing the Doxology, which was done with a will. Addresses were also made by Rev. E. L. Southgate, of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Prof. Leonard, of the Lees Institute at Jackson, Ky.; Rev. J. W. Tyler, Rev. Dr. E. W. McCorkle, Dr. E. O. Guerrant, and others. These touched the sore need of education for the people. The college building, which was conceived and completed by Dr. Guerrant with the assistance of many good people, stands on an eminence at the rear of the beautiful grounds, and is flanked by the two buildings for the teachers. It has two stories with four large rooms below, and a larger room upstairs. The rooms are equipped with modern desks and furniture. The room above, for chapel and general assembly purposes, is provided with an organ, maps, and charts, as well as the nucleus of a small library. The whole plant is in charge of Prof. Manning, with a corps of three assistants, to which will soon be added a kindergarten teacher. The need of such an institution may be realized when it is remembered that in the immediate locality there are more than two hundred children of school age. Such an institution as this is a necessity; otherwise the people would be almost without teaching, especially that of a Christian character. Their handicap in this way is being removed and they are allowed to have a fair chance with their more fortunate contemporaries in the vital work of home-making and life-making. The Herald family, which gave the land and lumber, have been in that community since the thirties. One old man resides on the same spot on which he settled sixty-six years since. This county has a record which will go into history. But a new day seems to have dawned. The people have new hopes and are eager for schools by which their children may be helped to a higher life than that to which their fathers have been doomed all these years. While the work of Dr. Guerrant and the Soul Winners' League is undenominational and interdenominational, he himself is one of the most faithful and industrious workers the Presbyterian Church has produced in half a century. For thirty years he has given his valuable efforts to the up-building of this entire section, and no man grudges him the happiness that has come with his toil, or the reward that will greet him when it is ended. These children and their children will be grateful to him, and their blessings will ever fall upon his head.

Scene at the Dedication of the Mountain College

ough the college is situated in the midst of the highlands, nearly ten miles from any town or village, and surrounded by mountains where there is neither a church nor school, in two weeks it has enrolled ninety-one pupils and more are coming every day. Some of the children walk four miles, and are there at 7 A.M. A dormitory is being prepared for these children, who are so near to learn. Dr. Guerrant presided and called upon Hon. Kelly Kash to introduce the Governor, who addressed the people in the following: "If you care to have the Governor win you, I would have you know that the Governor cares more than you. I am just one of you, who happened to be put upon for this position. This is no light matter, this great work which Dr. Guerrant is doing for you and your State. Only a few days ago, I spoke to three thousand Harvard students. I did not receive any greater applause there than the other night, but I wanted to talk. I wanted to tell Kentucky to have the right show up there. I knew that she was misunderstood. But when they played 'My Old Kentucky Home,' I felt just as I feel here to-day. The object of this life is not to show off, not to be great, but the chief thing to live for is to be of some use. An American is an American wherever you find him. Always generous, brave and sometimes a little pig-headed. Kentucky Americans are just like Massachusetts Americans. I myself was raised in the mountains, and those who are gathered here to-day are my people. We want you boys to are beautiful, with their green coverings; but they are not good for farming. Your houses are not capable of keeping out every gust of cold wind that shrieks and howls around them in the winter. But the way to have a glorious country is to have every human being in it feel kindly to every one else in it. The way you live is the way Lincoln lived. His life was hard, but I would rather by far be a Lincoln than a millionaire. His life shows what a man can do, and what he has done, you can do. Dr. Guer-

IN THE FIELD OF EVANGELISM

THE Gospel Tent, "Evangel," Fifty-seventh Street and Broadway, New York, has had a phenomenal week this summer and has come to be called a "Northfield in the heart of New York." The tent seated 2,400 persons and occasionally hundreds were turned away. At the final rally, the tent was filled, 1,000 persons went into the Central Presbyterian church for the overflow service, and thousands were unable to get into either meeting. In addition to eleven weeks of revival work in tent and in open air, three conventions were held, each lasting one week: One on Missions, another on Temperance, and a Bible Convention. Among the speakers were Rev. Drs. Len G. Broughton, James M. Gray, R. A. Torrey, A. C. Iron, J. Tolfree Parr (London, Eng.), William Phillips Hall, Harry Tylor, J. Wilbur Chapman, and Mr.

Charles M. Alexander, the noted singer; Wilton Merle Smith, R. S. MacArthur, D. C. Hughes, G. W. McPherson, etc. About 175,000 persons heard the Gospel and thousands indicated a desire to live the Christian life. The results cannot be tabulated; only eternity can reveal the power and fruit. Tent Evangel is independent, not being connected with any similar work in New York, and has completed its twenty-eighth season. Its officers are Rev. D. C. Hughes, D.D., President, father of Governor Hughes; Vice-President, Rev. E. H. Sanford, New York; Secretary, Rev. A. Lincoln Moore, D.D., New York; Treasurer, Mr. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones Street, New York; Superintendent, Evangelist G. W. McPherson, Yonkers, N. Y. Mr. McPherson says that Tent Evangel is now a permanent institution and that tens of thousands who, because of poverty and other reasons, cannot leave the city in the summer, find in the heart of New York "one of the greatest Bible Conventions on the globe." Rev. Len G. Broughton, the famous Atlanta preacher, has declared that in Tent Evangel there is conducted from summer to summer the largest and most continuous revival work in the world.

—REV. E. G. CHAMBERLIN, the Black Hills singing evangelist, lately closed a successful meeting at Scenic, S. D. Much interest is being taken in religious work among the mining camps.

—GEORGE L. GLUNT, superintendent of one of the Carnegie steel mills at Homestead, Pa., has resigned his post with a salary of $10,000 to enter the ministry. He will enter Western Theological Seminary.

—REV. DR. JOSEPH WILD, M.A., D.D., who passed away lately, was a pulpit orator of international fame. He was born in England in 1834. He came to Canada about 1855 and held several important M. E. pastorates there. He afterwards came to Brooklyn and occupied a Congregational pulpit there for fifteen years. He was a great student of prophecy, and his writings and lectures on the Lost Tribes of Israel made him widely known.

—GOVERNOR ROBERT B. GLENN of North Carolina has announced that when his term of office expires, next January, he will devote his entire time to religious evangelistic work. He is now an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and a most earnest Christian worker.

—HOWARD P. GLAISTER, a young English evangelist and Gospel singer, is now visiting the United States. He has done good work abroad and bears cordial recommendations to American churches desiring his services. He may be addressed in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—REV. TORSTEN M. HOENTHAL, pastor of the Finnish Seamen's Mission of Brooklyn, N. Y., is carrying on successfully his chosen work. Last year lodging was given to 971 and food provided for 873 sailors. Vessels have been visited and the sick looked after at home and in the hospitals.

—AN UNIQUE CELEBRATION is reported by the old McAuley Water Street Mission, New York, whose superintendent, John H. Wyburn, on September 25, celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his redemption "from a life of drunkenness and infidelity through the precious blood of Jesus."

SUPERSTITIONS OF THE FILIPINOS

Some of the Bright-faced Converts

Visitors to "The Christian Herald" Mission Boat

Unevangelized Cebuan Villagers

THE days and weeks are full of happy work with the Mission boat. After a rough trip of three days, we have reached our Mission station again. On the journey we had more than once to stop in sheltered harbors; but the joyful welcome, and the encouraging results among the congregations, with the inspiration the converts evidently receive from these visits, make us think lightly of the short, rough journey to reach them.

Of our little party on the boat, two who were ignorant Romanists when we first started and another who had heard the Gospel, but had not apparently fully decided, have this week confessed their faith by baptism and are now among the village Christians to whom we have been giving Bible instruction.

Our wheelman, who uses most of his spare time in evangelistic work, had a holiday of something less than six days lately. In that time he won ten men to the Saviour, away in a mountain settlement where the Gospel had never been heard. The work through the Mission launch, given to us by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, is going ahead day by day. The many dark looks cast on us when we go to a new place to visit converts, are in many cases changed to friendly smiles before we leave. We can see much seed is taking root.

Some of the native villagers show by the joy and love shining in their contented faces, that they know the peace of God. True, they have most of them seen much persecution, but they have seen, too, how those of their people who accept the Gospel rise from their discouraged lives to something better and nobler and happier.

Many strange things become known to us in our work. Every evening at 8 o'clock church bells sound in towns and villages, warning all to pray for the suffering spirits of their dead. The people have been taught that these spirits have a free hour from 8 to 9 in which to visit their friends on earth. It would not do to be caught by one's spirit friends forgetful of them. They might then become enemies. For this reason the ikog sa pagin (long fish-tail), which is credited with the virtue of frightening away both devil and angry spirits, is kept in the homes or carried by the young men who would visit their lady friends after ang hora sa nga calag (the hour of the spirits) has arrived.

For nine days after the death of the member of a family, the home is said to be continually visited by the spirit of the dead, who is allowed much of this time to learn if masses are being paid for and said for its rest. In Cebu City, groups of fisher-folks can be seen in the evening hour gathered on the shore, praying for their dead.

The "day off" given by the Church of Rome in the Philippines to the spirits in purgatory is of as much interest, perhaps, in many homes here as is the joyous Christmas in the home lands. On the eve of this eventful day of the year (which comes before "All Saints") ashes are strewn on the last step of the outside stairway, or, if there is but a humble bamboo ladder, then the ashes are strewn on the ground. At the first light of day, whoever awakes goes to see if the foot-prints of some stranger guest may be seen in the ashes, while the little children with hearts beating with vague fear, huddle together.

A religion of fear, and the continual dread of visits from the suffering spirits of their dead, have produced an effect on the nerves which might well be expected, and the Filipino, of these Southern isles especially, is well acquainted with the misery of over-strung nerves.

Can you wonder then that the Gospel and its messengers are welcome in these islands, and that our Mission boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, is kept busy going from coast to coast with its messages of peace and love! When the last village on Cebu coast has been visited, and its people encouraged and cheered to share God's good news with others, then we hope to take the Gospel to another island almost as large as Cebu itself. Though hundreds in this neighboring island have been pleading for the Gospel for some five years, and eight years ago sent an appeal to Manila to some of the missionaries there for a teacher, it has had to wait. There were not enough missionaries or native evangelists to meet the need near their hand. How good, if we could place a Cebuan evangelist here and then among the many who long for the Gospel on this large neighbor island!

KING CHULALONKORN'S TOUR

ABOUT ten years ago, the King of Siam, Chulalongkorn, visited Europe. He so much liked its appearance that he has just made another pilgrimage to the Western world. His return to his own land has been celebrated with an amount of pomp and circumstance of which Americans, in their most festive moments, have no conception.

Bangkok, on this occasion, was literally ablaze with glory. Her wonderful temples were adorned with brilliantly painted and embroidered flags and pennants, flowers were everywhere, and the entire population turned out to welcome their beloved monarch, for he is immensely popular.

Once this could not have happened. At the first intimation from his forerunners that the king was approaching, every one of his subjects would have to run into the farthest recesses of his dwelling, close his eyes, and hide himself until his illustrious sovereign had passed by. He who dared to peep through a knothole and gaze upon the sacred form of the ruler, was even liable to death. Only until the bugles had blown release, could he venture to show again in his shop his humble countenance.

This complete separation between the king and his people was ended by Monghut, the father of the present monarch. Monghut was no common potentate. He had been early consecrated to the Buddhist priesthood—the Brotherhood of the Yellow Robe—and many years he served in that order.

When Monghut was called to the throne after the death of his predecessor, he resolved to install at once certain reforms. As the king of Siam is an absolute monarch, he had little trouble in accomplishing his will. His path was further smoothed by the fact that his personality was peculiarly pleasing, and that he had from the first shown the people that he wished only to make them happy.

The consequence was that very soon laws gradually abolishing slavery were set on foot, schools were opened, the sale of wives by husbands could not be executed without the consent of the former, and parents were forbidden to sell their children before the age of fifteen, and then only when they were willing.

Monghut was a man of hot temper, but he was witty and truly broad-minded, and it is largely from him that the present sovereign inherited his ability and his strength of character.

Monghut tried to break up gambling and drunkenness; but it was not until 1883, when the present king had reigned for fifteen years, that really effective measures were put into operation for banishing from the kingdom these worst foes of the Oriental peoples. The king saw that, powerful as he was, he could not stamp out these sins without enlisting the co-operation of the European nations whose subjects were importing into his dominion the means of their demoralization.

Accordingly, he secured the services of a scholar and diplomatic Englishman, and sent him, with one of his ministers, to the courts of Europe. Through their efforts, treaties were made which so thoroughly protected Siam that the king has been almost completely able to banish the sins which were ruining her cities.

It has been almost impossible to get any reliable statistics of Siam, owing to the superstitious dread of numbering the people, and to the fact that they persist in thinking only the men worth counting; but its area is about that of Great Britain and Ireland, and its population about 7,000,000 souls. France is gradually cajoling away its territory, and has already succeeded in obtaining a large slice of the Malay peninsula. England has set a noble example in her dealings with the Orientals, in that she has not endeavored to exploit her East Indian possessions for her own gain. The other nations have been more selfish. They are draining the simple brown people of their wealth in order to enrich themselves; and even the most downtrodden and caste-ridden of the sons of Shem are waking up to the extortions of their foreign "friends."

The first king of the present dynasty, King Rama V, was an intrepid soldier who repulsed the Burmese in the most daring and successful of their many raids upon Siamese territory. They had destroyed Ayuthia, the capital, and Tak in 1766 established the seat of government at Bangkok.

THE WRECKED WRIGHT AEROPLANE

Removing Lieut. Selfridge from the Scene of the Wreck

Orville Wright, who Met with the Accident

Condition of the Aeroplane After it Landed

FRANCE, Germany and the United States have all been striving with such eagerness for the mastery of the air, that an electric shock from the New World to the Old seemed to follow the announcement that Orville Wright's aeroplane had met with disaster, badly injuring the inventor himself and killing his companion, Lieutenant Selfridge, of the United States Army. Wilbur Wright, brother of Orville, had been making plans for the demonstration of the Wright machine in France, while his brother was carrying on his experiments at Fort Myer, Va. Until the accident Orville held the record for the longest and most successful flight. The experiments at Fort Myer were under government auspices, as the Military and Naval Departments are extremely anxious to discover if the aeroplane may be of service in actual warfare as an aid to reconnaissance. For several weeks preceding the fatal day Wright had been making successful ascents, and crowds came from Washington and hovered about the outskirts of the military reservation in the hope of catching a glimpse of the daring experimenter as he soared in the aeroplane time and again around the parade ground, turning above the tree-tops like some great bird with white, spreading wings. A large number of prominent officials seemed to catch the fever, and many requests poured in on Orville Wright asking for a trip in the machine.

It was at last arranged that Lieutenant Selfridge, of the Signal Corps, should accompany Wright on one of his ascents, as he had been appointed to study aeronautics for the army. On the afternoon of the accident, the aeroplane was not wheeled out of its shed until nearly five o'clock in the afternoon. It had been thought inadvisable to make an earlier start, as a light breeze had been blowing across the parade ground all day, and the puffs as they came from time to time would have made a flight precarious. At last the wind died away and preparations were begun for the trial trip. Mr. Wright intended to make the flight a short one on account of approaching darkness, and he had carried a passenger but a few times before this.

Twelve minutes after the machine had been brought out, the two men were in their places. Mr. Wright gave the signal and the machine went forward and upward from the monorail on which it gets its start. The two men together weighed two hundred and ninety pounds, and the machine moved slowly as it rose into the air. It seemed to steady itself for a moment and then started to circle the parade ground, the spectators below watching every movement with bated breath. Hardly a word was spoken and hardly a person stirred. It seemed for the first four minutes that the aeroplane had demonstrated its ability to carry more than one passenger and had thus opened up almost boundless possibilities in aerial navigation. It was moving at about thirty-five miles an hour and was seventy-five feet from the ground.

Mr. Wright turned the steering wheel and the machine veered sharply from south to east. It crossed above the shed from which it had come a few moments before, when, without warning, a sharp crackling sound sent a thrill of apprehension through the crowd of spectators. From the rear of the flying-machine a piece of wood dropped to the ground, noted by every eye—the right propeller had broken. The left propeller kept whirling swiftly, sending the machine around abruptly in a circle. Mr. Wright saw that the machine must come down, and he shut off the motor, and the propeller ceased to revolve. The aeroplane seemed to drop slowly and steadily as usual, and both the steersman and those who watched him felt that the danger was over and the machine would land safely, as it had done a score of times. After it had come down about thirty-five feet, it suddenly pointed down and shot with lightning speed to earth. There was a cry of horror from the crowd, a reverberating crash, and a cloud of dust marked the spot where the earthward plunge had ended.

A lieutenant mounted his horse and galloped to the aeroplane, followed by a squad of soldiers. They began to pull away the wreckage and found the machine to be but a tangled mass of planes, framework, wooden sticks and torn canvas. The propellers stuck up above the main mass, the left one intact, the right one, which had caused the disaster, broken off about a foot from the central hub. The aeronauts were found thrown forward on the front wires that brace that part of the machine. Mr. Wright's left leg was caught under part of the frame and broken near the hip joint. He was taken out and placed under the care of a surgeon, while they took out the Lieutenant, who was unconscious and apparently fatally injured. Both men were placed on stretchers and borne carefully to the post hospital. It was found that Mr. Wright had several ribs broken in addition to the fractured limb. Lieutenant Selfridge died a few hours after being taken to the hospital.

A few days after the accident at Fort Myer Wilbur Wright in France made the most successful flight in the history of aeroplanes. At LeMans he was in the air for one hour and thirty-one minutes, and could have remained longer, but came down on account of darkness. He had gone forty-two miles. He was cheered enthusiastically by 10,000 spectators. Mr. Orville Wright says he will continue his experiments as soon as he is well, and is apparently undaunted by his mishap.

LIFE-SAVERS AND THE GOSPEL

READERS of this journal have already heard of the Pocket Testament League, a new movement to induce people everywhere to read a chapter each day in God's Word, and to carry it about with them wherever they go. The idea originated with Mrs. Charles M. Alexander, wife of the well-known evangelist. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and Mr. Alexander are earnestly promoting it, and the membership is steadily increasing.

During the evangelistic visit of Dr. Chapman and Mr. Alexander in Norfolk, Va., lately, Dr. Chapman called at a Life-Saving Station on the coast. He told the men about the Pocket Testament League, and a few days later eight of the nine members of the crew enrolled. The other member was not present, but the men said: "Leave a Testament for him also." Dr. Chapman is now planning to present Testaments to the members of every life-saving crew in the United States who will join the League.

Recently, while crossing from England to America on the steamship Atlantic, Mr. Charles M. Alexander induced so many to join the League that a New York newspaper, describing the arrival of the boat, said it contained "a shipful of Bible readers." During the eight days' voyage, three Gospel meetings were held, and 135 members were secured for the League; and each was presented with an illustrated Testament. Seventy who joined were members of the crew. They included men from the engineering department, the two Marconi wireless telegraph operators, and forty-nine stewards.

A big, stalwart steward, to whom a Testament had been given just a year previous, said that the little book had traveled with him over 70,000 miles, and that since receiving it, he had accepted Christ. For about twenty-five years he had followed the sea, but had never had the courage to carry a Testament with him until now.

Membership cards and leaflets giving full information concerning the League may be secured, free, by writing to the Pocket Testament League Headquarters, Winona Lake, Ind.

Religion and Politics

OUR Presbyterian contemporary The Westminster, of Philadelphia, in common with several other journals, is discussing the vexed question of religion in politics. Its conclusion is that it is clearly within the province of a religious publication to discuss politics, but that it should remain non-partisan. Unfortunately, politics and partisanship are virtually inseparable. "Political parties," says an authoritative writer, "are the natural subdivisions of a free people," and while it is true that they often lead to grave abuses, thus far no substitute for parties has ever been discovered. Under the circumstances, it is difficult to see how politics and partisanship can be divorced. Your partisan stands in the same relation to politics that your denominationalist does to religion. He must have his rallying point; he must be on the fighting line, or he is out of the battle altogether.

If a religious journal would influence politics without stooping to partisanship, it must keep aloof from the "ruck and muck" of the fight, and, from high ground, deal with those issues that affect the general morals or welfare. The moment it descends to the advocacy of platforms and candidates, or tells men how to vote, it assumes the partisan badge. There are, however, rare occasions—as in great State or national crises involving issues of the highest moral or patriotic character—when it would be a crime for the religious journal to be silent. At such times it must take its place fearlessly with the forces of righteousness and do its full duty. But this does not apply to the average campaign, with its mud-throwing, its wire-pulling, its unblushing mendacities, and with its thousand other discordant accompaniments. Is it a wonder that in the grand game of politics the higher sentiments go to the wall?

Religion and the modern brand of "practical" politics won't mix well. Attempts to amalgamate the two have wrecked many a promising pulpit, and any religious paper which tries it, except on rare and imperative occasions, is hunting trouble.

The Author of "The Workers"

IT WILL be a long time before Walter A. Wyckoff's The Workers ceases to be valuable sociologically, historically, and for Christian enterprises. An author is not always as earnest as his writings; but in his case not only did the practice necessarily precede the publication of the teaching, but his life has been in harmony with it. His death in the prime of vigor and usefulness is a loss to sociology.

Walter Wyckoff's experiment in 1891 of working his way as an unskilled laborer across the continent, to study the conditions of the laboring classes, was far more suited to him than to most young men recently out of college, because he already understood and cared for them through personal, self-denying Christian efforts among them.

"His fame (says a biographer in the New York Tribune) rests not upon any strikingly original theory or constructive research, but rather upon a thoroughgoing, sincere investigation, at first hand, of the conditions under which unskilled laborers struggle along in this country. Countless students before him had dipped into the great stream of life, but few had the endurance, courage and scientific zeal to sound its depths and struggle in its hidden currents. Since The Workers appeared the power of example has stimulated a small army of persons to repeat Professor Wyckoff's great exploration. But, unfortunately for workingmen and all who are sincerely interested in them, most of these slumming parties and heart-to-heart talks with sausage makers have been indulged in for the sake of fame or cash, with the inevitable result that fancy has sorely chafed the heel of fact and sent the latter off limping. But despite these insincerities and dilettantisms the aftermath of The Workers has been good, for Professor Wyckoff's discoveries have puffed away old illusions about human depravity and strengthened sympathies."

But Professor Wyckoff's most precious legacy to us is the memory of his goodness, and its results. Men of thought and knowledge on every side speak of this: "He gave himself gladly for the things which he knew to be of lasting value. The influence of the love he showed for his fellow men in his life of service both in Princeton and elsewhere will remain after him to uplift and encourage others."

The Tuberculosis Congress

WASHINGTON has several times within recent years been the scene of notable international congresses, but hardly one of them can compare in importance to the great meeting of physicians and men of science from the world over to devise plans to fight the "great white plague."

This dread disease was once regarded as almost hopeless, but medical science has studied tuberculosis and found many methods of attacking it with success. A large number of so-called cures have proved failures, but several, combined with the present open-air treatment, seem to meet with success. At the Congress were shown a multitude of devices for the prevention of the disease, the purification of milk and other liquids and solids through which the disease is often transmitted. Among the honored guests of the Congress is Dr. Koch, the famous German specialist who has given his life to the study of tuberculosis and the effort to find a cure. Other distinguished foreigners gave the physicians the benefit of their experience in fighting the disease. The proceedings of the Congress should be watched with interest by the general public, for many of the suggestions offered are simple and could be easily followed, and the physicians need the co-operation of the public if they are to be successful in their great undertaking.

A Good Time to Clean Up

CHOLERA, which is almost always to be found in some parts of Asia, has stolen upon Europe like a thief in the night. In several provinces of Russia, the plague has already secured a foothold, and in St. Petersburg nearly two hundred deaths are recorded daily. It finds its victims chiefly among the poor and ignorant who live in unsanitary quarters, and also in the military barracks and the prisons. Enough grave-diggers cannot be found to bury the dead. France, Germany and England are taking precautions to prevent the importation of the plague, and suspected cases have been discovered in Stockholm and Stettin. For weeks past it has been raging at Manila, and several cases are reported in the Azores.

Cholera is a "filth disease," and at a time like the present, when its extent is almost world-wide, no seaport whose sanitation is neglected is to be regarded as immune. It is a good season for our own cities to clean up. Although there has not been a case of cholera in New York in the last ten years, the health officials are displaying great energy, and other American seaports should wisely follow their example. Our health authorities declare that we have the most thoroughly equipped system in the world for preventing the importation of diseases from other lands. "Clean house" should be the universal watchword until the danger is past. During the last great visitation of cholera in England, the city of Salford escaped without a single case, while other places suffered heavily. Its immunity was due to the fact that Salford's population, to a man, "cleaned up" the city, its streets, lanes, alleys, tenements and dwelling-houses generally, and did this so thoroughly that fevers and other contagious diseases also disappeared, and the place has ever since been held up as a model of sanitation.

Humble Lives

WE OCCASIONALLY receive letters from readers residing in remote parts of the country, where there are comparatively few modern conveniences. In these letters, it sometimes happens that the writers bemoan the loneliness and unimportance of their lives. They would be at the forefront, but Providence has seen fit to place them in comparative seclusion. So they regard their lives as insignificant because they have no great opportunities.

But no one can rightly look at life in that way.

No life is insignificant in God's sight. Nor is the real sum total of a life be stated until the end of things, when "the leaves of the judgment book are folded." No life can be estimated by itself; it is to complete the past, and is completed by the future. The humblest life, with the narrowest of elements, may be chosen to train another life, through which God in his wisdom may design to touch the hearts of a continent.

So in our life, be it humble or important, in city or remote hamlet, crowded full as it may be with work and care, there is always room, at any time, for noble aspirations and beautiful thoughts, for the inflowing and indwelling of a spiritual fullness, which may give environment and tone to everything and fill the heart with unspeakable happiness.

A MONEY-SAVING PROPOSITION

Mrs. CASPAR WHITNEY, the editor of The Outing Magazine, recently made some comment on the intimate connection between a wholesome outdoor life and Christian living, which we believe will be of interest to our readers. We publish herewith some of his remarks:

"We are learning a lot of common-sense things these days, but one of the most valuable lessons is that which emphasizes the need of wholesome play for the young and fresh air and relaxation for us all; not only that our bodies may be benefited, but that our moral tone may be bettered. No intelligent man or woman in these enlightened days is unaware how powerful an influence, for clean, healthful living, are the rightfully conducted games of the youth, and the relaxation of the outdoor world upon men and women. The annual vacation pilgrimage to the shrine of Nature grows amazingly. No man or woman can view the marvels of God's handiwork, whether in the flowered meadow, the silent forest, or along the rugged mountain trail, without experiencing a feeling of spiritual uplift."

"Outdoor men as a rule are clean-thinking and clean-living, and the influence of the outdoor world makes for wholeness of mind and body."

"Whatever stimulates our interest in and directs our steps toward the outdoor world is an influence for the betterment of men and women. Such an influence is The Outing Magazine, which brings to us the entertainment of the adventurous, pioneering, home-making, play-inviting world, that it may at the same time show us also the road leading to clean and healthful living. To attract wayfarers to this road is the object of the editor."

We are pleased to inform our readers that in a fortunate special arrangement, we are enabled to offer The Outing Magazine, published monthly, at $3 per annum, in combination with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, published weekly at $1.50 per annum, at the remarkably low figure of $2.25 for the two. In order to get the benefit of this special rate, you must send your order before October 20. If you are already a subscriber to either of these magazines, your subscription will be extended one year from present expiration date, so all who wish may avail themselves of this exceptional opportunity. Remember this offer expires October 20. Therefore act quickly. Address all orders to

Disastrous Floods

DISASTROUS floods have visited many parts of our country. The people of the Southland have suffered unusually from this kind of calamity. The floods in the eastern part of North Carolina have been particularly destructive. At Fayetteville, N. C., at the head of navigation, the Cape Fear River rose seventy-one feet, breaking all previous records. Parts of Cumberland, Columbus, Brunswick, New Hanover and Bender Counties in North Carolina have been flooded for weeks from five to fifteen feet deep—over roads, bridges, farms, etc. One could row in a skiff in the country roads many miles. Hundreds of people were driven from their homes; crops, barns, and residences were destroyed and cattle, horses, hogs were drowned. The suffering in Bender County was so severe that rescuing parties and parties with provisions and other means of relief had to be sent from other districts to the people. Three boats with food and clothing and medicine and a Committee of Relief were sent from Wilmington, N. C. There has been such a total destruction of crops that the Secretary of Agriculture has been earnestly petitioned to send to the farmers, whose crops have been ruined, seeds for the quickest kind of a harvest, which request will undoubtedly be granted by Secretary Wilson. Disasters of one kind or another visit every country and every clime and have done so since the world began. Men may not always see their reason, but they contain moral lessons which the Divine Father desires that his children shall learn. Caution, wisdom, courage, energy, patience and benevolence are often taught in the severe school of calamity and sorrow. As a rule floods bring more permanent value to farms in the richness of their deposit than they carry away in crops, fences and buildings. God plants his footsteps in the storm and rides upon the flood.

The Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth King forever. (Psa. 29:10.)

Destructive Forest Fires

While the floods have been devastating so many districts, especially in the South, the dry weather in many other sections of the country has occasioned the most terrific forest fires that have ever swept across the land. Almost simultaneously, fires in the pine trees of Maine and in the forests of the Pacific broke out with great fury and the conflagration has stretched from ocean to ocean. They are now raging in the Adirondacks, the Catskills, the Appalachians, in the woods of New Jersey, Michigan and Wisconsin, and through the Laurentian Mountains in Canada and the great Northwest as far as Vancouver. A thousand small fires surround Lake Superior, Lake Huron and northern Lake Michigan. Millions of dollars' worth of forest timber has been burned up. Farms with crops have been blackened to the ground, farm houses and villages have been swept away, and untold wealth has been destroyed. Fortunately there has been small loss of life compared with the material damage.

The smoke of these forest fires has darkened the atmosphere in many parts of the country, rendering it hazy and heavy as far as a thousand miles away from the fires that caused it. The air is so dense with the smoke that ships in some lines on the Pacific are unable to sail, and have waited indefinitely till the atmosphere shall have cleared.

No human prudence could have prevented the floods that have devastated sections of our country. To be sure, the reckless and almost wicked destruction of timber has dried up the rivers and has increased the floods, but ordinarily the heavy rains and the melting of the snow in the mountains caused the disaster, which human foresight could not avert. But with forest fires it is different. While the summer has been dry and there was the greater danger of conflagration, many of the fires could have been avoided if proper precautions had been taken and if better organized instrumentalities had been used to check them. The lighting of a pipe or cigar and the dry leaves catching from the match thrown down, the coals from a hunter's camp scattered by a gust of wind, and other trivial causes, as well as the sparks from the locomotive, start many fires that might have been avoided; and fires when started are often looked upon very lightly at first and are allowed by careless neighbors to get beyond their control before they undertake to check them.

Whatever element of human fault there may have been to cause the forest fires, they are employed as instruments of Divine Providence. The mild side of truth is seen in the growing crops and happy homes of farm and village, and the severe side of the truth in the withering, consuming fires. There is a Calvary, but the truth of Sinai remains and is revealed in nature and in human experience, as well as in Scripture.

And the mountain burned with fire, unto the midst of heaven. (Deut. 4:11.)

Automatic Brakes on Cars

The experiment in Chicago for the automatic stopping of trains which accidentally or otherwise run past block signals and threatened disaster, was a complete success. A train on the main line of the Burlington was sent at a speed of fifty miles an hour into a section controlled by the new automatic device. The throttle was wide open, yet the train was brought to a standstill within a distance of 1,000 feet. The railroad experts, gathered from all parts of the country for the trial, said that the automatic device was the best safeguard against accident that had ever been invented. As a result of the experiment, it is believed that the device will be adopted by all the railroads in the country. The system can be installed at a small cost on any track, and with it in operation it will be impossible for trains to rush past block signals into collision. It is said that the invention finally solves the problem of human fallibility, stopping a train when, as occasionally happens, an old and tried engineer seems to lose control of himself and his engine and runs ahead in the face of all signals against him. In our complex life, with its inventions and multiplied dangers, science is trying its best to keep pace with the onward movement and guarantee better protection to life, verifying the contention of the sacred essayist that increased knowledge makes life more secure.

For wisdom is a defense, and money is a defense; but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it. (Eccles. 7:12.)

Rabbit's Eye in Human Head

A blind man has had his eyesight restored through a rabbit's eye, as the result of an operation performed by Dr. Henry R. Lesser, of New York. The operation consisted in grafting the cornea from the eye of a rabbit upon the eye of the patient, who had been blind for fifteen years. He is now able to count figures at a distance of twelve inches, distinguish clearly, and go about unattended. The operation, though not unknown to optical surgery, has proven singularly successful in this case. It is the brain that sees, but the material organ is its instrument of vision. When, for any reason, the window of the soul is shut, there is blindness. The conscience is the eye of the soul. If it is put out or curtailed by sin, there is spiritual blindness. Christ, in his Sermon on the Mount, draws a parallel between the natural and spiritual eye, teaching the necessity of a transparent eye for the reception of religious truth.

The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light. (Matt. 6:22.)

Woman Mountain Climber

A recent telegram from Lima, Peru, announces the fact that Miss Anna S. Peck has succeeded in reaching the summit of Mount Huascaran, estimated to be a height of 25,000 feet. One of her guides will lose a hand and both feet, which were frozen. Miss Peck, whose home is in Providence, R. I., began her mountain climbing in Greece, where she sojourned as a student of the American School at Athens after graduating from the University of Michigan. She got so easily to the summits of Hymettus and Pentelicus that she thought she would try the Alps. She was the first woman who set her foot on the Matterhorn. She ascended Mount Sorata in Bolivia, 25,000 feet high. After several attempts to climb Huascaran, in which she got as high as 18,000 feet, she succeeded at last in reaching the summit, the highest point in the Andes range.

Among other feats, she has climbed to the top of Orizaba, Mexico, and to Cloud's Rest, the highest peak in the Yosemite. She spent one night on the top of Mount Shasta, sleeping in the snow. Rare level-headedness, muscular development, physical endurance, and all-daring courage were required to accomplish the feats which Miss Peck has performed, and there is no doubt that, by her wide travel, keen observation, and contact with all kinds of people, she will have much that is valuable to communicate to her fellow men, and doubtless her mental and moral faculties have been improved by her travels and achievements. But a few women champion mountain-climbers will satisfy the demand of the time.

There is the so much louder call for women in the gentler paths of endeavor and in those of science, literature, art, business, professions and home. It is pretty much of a feat for a woman to climb a mountain 25,000 feet high, but there are altitudes of truth, beauty, love and holy endeavor which it is the highest ambition and most earnest purpose of the average woman to reach.

David was come to the top of the mount. (II. Sam. 15:32.)

MISSIONARY, PIONEER AND EXPLORER

The Wonderful Career of George Grenfell, the Hero of Congoland

A Congo Warrior

THE greatest missionary book of the year is undoubtedly that which has come from the accomplished pen of Sir Harry Johnston, the most famous of living authorities on Africa. George Grenfell, who passed away so recently, was one of the most influential, adventurous, and successful of the band of missionaries who have been during this generation penetrating and opening to civilization and Christianity the very heart of the Dark Continent.

Grenfell recorded with pains and accuracy his romantic experiences and his extraordinary explorations. This wonderful man inherited a double portion of the spirit of Livingstone. The book will for long constitute the one unquestioned authority on all that concerns the history and the interior life of that Congo Independent State which is now challenging the attention of the world, while it also furnishes the most close and intimate views ever published of Fernando Po and the Cameroons. First comes a picture of Grenfell's life, mainly in association with missionary exploration. Then pictures are drawn of the interior of Africa before the coming of the white man, and the history is recited in brief of the founding of the Congo Independent State, its conflicts with the cruel Arab slavers, and its later tragic misdeeds.

It was in 1845 that the first Baptist Mission was established on the African Continent, the Cameroons being chosen for the attempt. The devoted Alfred Saker and Joseph Merrick, an enthusiastic Christian mulatto, were the first two agents. It was under the fascinations of Saker, on a visit he paid to England, that Grenfell became a missionary. In 1874 he returned with his adopted leader to engage in the new work of his life. At this time he was twenty-five years old. Prior to his entering Bristol College as a missionary student he had, at the age of fifteen, as apprentice to a Birmingham firm, acquired such a knowledge of machinery as served him well in subsequent years in dealing with the mechanism of the steamers upon which, from time to time, he traversed the tributaries of the mighty Congo River. He was able to fit together for actual service the Baptist steam yacht, the Peace, the construction of which he had superintended in a Thames shipbuilding yard.

[George Grenfell and the Congo. A history and description of the Congo Independent State and adjoining districts of Congoland, and similar notes on the Cameroons and the Island of Fernando Po. The whole founded on the diaries and researches of the late Rev. George Grenfell, of the Baptist Missionary Society, F.R.G.S. By Sir Harry Johnston, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., D.Sc. Hutchinson & Co., London. Two Vols.]

Grenfell both evangelized and explored after the fashion of Livingstone. Indeed, he remarkably resembled that Gospel hero in his medium stature, his kind, calm demeanor, his native meekness, and his inquiring and open turn of mind. Grenfell had well earned the high tributes paid him by the Christian Church, as well as the honors bestowed on him by the British government, the kings of Portugal and Belgium, and the Royal Geographical Society of Great Britain.

These two volumes furnish a splendid record also of the history and character of the Congo State, from the time of its discovery in the fourteenth century. It has passed through fiery experiences. The terrible customs of the natives, the abominable and diabolical paganism, the blood-thirsty warfare, and the appalling "rubber atrocities," make up a lurid literary and pictorial panorama. The royal decorations which Grenfell received he learned to spurn when he at length became convinced of the real character of the rule of the Belgians. For a long time he cherished hope that reforms would be instituted; but at length he despaired of humanity from that source.

Romantic beauty and painful suffering characterize Congoland and its life. Missionaries live and die heroically there, and splendid work is being done, from the mouth of the Congo River to Yakusu, 3,000 miles up the mighty stream. Sir Harry Johnston pays high tributes to this heroism. He affirms that, as he saw it, the missionary life stood at a high level of cheerfulness. The schools, the gardens, the brickyards, the blacksmith shops, laundries, sawpits, printing-presses, dispensaries, and farms; the churches—often temporary and frail structures of mats and grass, at other times the triumphant outcome of three years' breathless toil, designed, decorated, finished by the men who taught the natives how to make and bake the bricks, how to saw and shape the timbers, forge the iron clamps, and affix the tiles or bolt the corrugated iron, all testified to the indefatigable devotion of these pioneers of Christian civilization. Yet not one of them "ever recorded a dull day or a bored feeling in his diary. They were too busy to be bored." The missionary women, too, were splendid, with their sewing classes, their laundries, their cooking lessons—taking up native food-products, and teaching the girls and married women how to prepare by better, cleaner methods, and how to cook appetizingly, rescuing and training orphans, checking the terrible mortality among the children.

And all this in spite of painful vicissitudes—malaria, black-water fever, dysentery, ruined cas-tion, wild and ferocious animals, the annoyance and danger of noxious insects, mosquitoes, tse-tse flies, sand-flies, hippo-flies, jiggers, ants, locusts, wasps, etc. Nothing daunts the missionaries, and one of the bravest that ever fought Satan in the darkest habitations of cruelty was George Grenfell. In June, 1906, he was seized with an unusually severe attack of black-water fever at Yalamba, far the interior. None were with him but a few native attendants, who, realizing his danger, transported him to the State station of Basoko; and here, receiving medical attendance too late, he died July 1, 1906. Here he lies buried, having certainly left an imperishable name and fame in the history of the Congo.

EVANGELISM IN THE SOUTHERN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

THE first work of the Permanent Committee on Evangelism, recently appointed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States (popularly called the Southern Presbyterian Church), was the holding of a conference on this subject at Montreat, N. C. Rev. Charles R. Nisbet, Chairman of the Church's Committee, presided over the sessions of the conference at Montreat. There has arisen in the Southern Presbyterian Church an evangelistic movement such as has never been known in her past history.

One cause which has contributed to the rise of this movement among the Presbyterians of the South is the example set by their brethren in the North. For more than ten years the Northern Presbyterian Church has had a Committee on Evangelistic Work. During those years such advances have been made that this church is rapidly forging to the front. Southern Presbyterians have witnessed the results of this example, and acknowledge, with gratitude, the weight of its influence. The organization, known as the Association of Evangelistic Missions, came into existence chiefly through the influence of one man, the Rev. R. A. Walton, D.D., who is its Secretary and virtual head. After the appointment by the Northern Presbyterian Church of its Committee on Evangelistic Work, Dr. Walton became associated with Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, chairman of that committee. He was his principal assistant in the simultaneous campaigns in New York, Philadelphia, Columbus, O., Minneapolis, St. Paul, on the Pacific Coast and in New Jersey. Having a special love for the church of his nativity, he unselfishly severed his connection with Dr. Chapman and his committee to devote himself to the work of evangelization in the South.

The general purpose of the new organization is to promote evangelism. This is accomplished chiefly through evangelistic literature sent out from the Association headquarters in Louisville, Ky. The management is in the hands of a Board of Directors, chosen annually composed mainly of two ministers and one layman from each of the thirteen synods of the church. A. J. Alexander, M.D., of Spring Station, Ky., a prominent layman, is the President.

The appointment by the General Assembly of a Permanent Committee on this cause was no doubt largely the result of the influence of this Association. For time, the Committee and the Association will co-operate in the work. The general management will be committed to the Committee and special work of conducting simultaneous evangelistic campaigns will be continued by the Association. Such a campaign is just beginning in Texas. Union meetings will be held wherever possible.

It is the purpose of the Assembly's Committee to arouse the entire church on the subject of evangelism. This it proposes to do largely through general conferences for the whole church, and especially through conferences in all the presbyteries throughout the bounds of the Assembly.

A Student Bible Convention

The First International Student Bible Convention to be held under the auspices of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations meets at Columbus, O., October 22-25. The number of delegates will be limited to 1,200. No college or university will be permitted to send more than ten men. The object of the Convention will be to promote intelligent, systematic, personal study of the English Bible. The Convention will be entertained without expense to the delegates by the United Brotherhoods of the city of Columbus. Mr. John R. Mott will preside.

The Bible and the School

GLANCING back, shall we say to the sixties, and comparing then with now, it is impossible to avoid the acknowledgment that there used to be much more positive religious training given in the schools than there is to-day. As a rule, the public schools were formerly opened each morning by religious exercises, consisting of reading the Bible and offering prayer. This was done by the principal, and in addition there were often hymns or chants sung by the pupils. A little homily in which moral truths were impressed often accompanied the opening of school. In deference at present to an imaginary popular sentiment, a great change has taken place in this especial practice. The children who attend the public schools in most of our large cities come from a variety of homes, of different creeds, and often of different races. While the greatest care is properly taken to cultivate love for the flag, and the children are taught to be patriotic, such morality as is inculcated is not openly drawn from the Bible. There are schools in which portions of the Old Testament are read at the discretion of the superintendent, but even here in a majority of cases there is a sense in which the Bible is tolerated rather than honored.

One of our correspondents, a veteran teacher, writes mournfully in reference to this change, and calls attention to another alteration that has imperceptibly taken place. She says, and the older readers of this page will bear her out in saying, that the school readers in vogue in the middle of the nineteenth century, Sanders', McGuffey's, etc., contained many selections from the Bible as literature, and many stirring essays, stories and poems that enforced practical Christianity. These admirable school readers have been superseded by others that are so compendiums of literature, but in the latter we find nature study and science predominating over what is ethical and devotional.

There does not seem to be reason for either alarm or dismay, notwithstanding the fact that Christian people regret any declension of the sort we are admitting. Bible reading, even in those old days, was sometimes perfunctory. It was much to the children to know familiar day by day with the melody and the wisdom of that most magnificent book, our English Bible. No one who loves it can help being sorry that both in our homes and schools children are less well acquainted with it than once they were. Yet the teachers as a body display a high standard, their own characters are noble and sincere, if they daily set before their pupils an example of Christian generosity, sweet unselfishness and perfect honesty, the little children will not suffer so much.

Every man and woman to whom the Bible is a living Book may so illustrate it when in contact with growing minds that, although its texts may be unfamiliar, its spirit will vitalize each recitation. If school boards object for reasons that seem to them sufficient to allow official reading of the Scriptures in the schoolroom, Christian parents should remind themselves that their obligation in the household is increased. They should let no day pass without something that links the home with the Father in heaven. Doing what they can for their own children they should besides extend helping hands to missions, Sunday Schools and Settlements. We are still a Christian nation.

Girl Athletes

A recent visitor at a thronged seaside resort found nothing more interesting than the spectacle of lithe and beautiful girls engaged in playing ball upon the shore. We used to be told that a woman could not throw a stone or toss a ball with the deftness and precision that distinguished men in the same act. A girl might be graceful in handling an oar, might be sure-footed in climbing a mountain, might even win honors in a running match, but when it was a question of playing ball, her brothers must surpass her. In these days all this is changed. Basket-ball is one of the favorite athletic sports of girls from the grammar school to the senior class in college. Comfortably dressed in loosely fitting gymnasium suits, it does much to increase their symmetry of chest and limb, to promote deep breathing and perfect health. The lady who watched the girls playing baseball on the shore, with a complete nine on either side, noted with pleasure that in that pure air and on that beaten diamond they seemed to play as fearlessly as boys who had been trained to it from the time they could catch or toss a ball. There is to be noted the danger to the physique of growing girls of over-work in games that tax wind and muscle, but on the whole it is a good sign of the times that girls are learning to excel in all sports that may be played in the open. There is no reason why a girl who can throw a straight ball shall not as well know how to knead a firm loaf of bread or sweep a room as thoroughly as did her mother and her grandmother.

Tolstoi and his Grandchildren

THE TOLSTOI HOME AT YASNAYA POLYIANA, RUSSIA

The Afternoon Toilet

A THREAT of snow in the air, chill winds and low-hanging clouds indicate an improbability that there will be callers this afternoon. The temptation is to stay as close by the fire as one can, and wear the dress that one had on during the tasks of the morning. This dress is often rather unbecoming. It might as well be pretty as the reverse, for a blue gingham or a chocolate print can be trim and dainty, and may be finished at the neck and wrist with ruffles or turn-overs that give a delicate finish. But the woman who does her own work and finds it hard enough to bake as many loaves of bread in a week as her hungry boys demand, smiles in a superior way as she reads the last sentence. She fancies that the other woman who sits at her desk and writes knows very little about the exactings of good housekeeping when the working is busy from morning till night. Well, she is mistaken.

The woman who writes has had no end of practical experience in her time, and is just as likely to look frumpy in the morning as anybody else. All the same, she knows that frumpiness is an evil that ought to be remedied. If it must be tolerated in the morning, it should cease by the afternoon. Whether callers come or not there are always the home people, and it is their right to find mother and the girls looking neat and attractive in the afternoon. To change one's dress implies regard for one's appearance in the eyes of others. Often a pretty dress helps a mother in the management of her children by a sort of intangible moral effect that eludes definition. "Why are you taking so much pains to-day, and wearing your best gown?" was the question asked of a teacher as she set out one Monday morning. Her answer was suggestive. "Two of the most troublesome little fellows in the grade below me have been promoted, and will be in my class to-day for the first time. I have found out that one can manage boys much better when one looks pretty and has on bright ribbons than when she looks like a dowdy."

Mothers might take a hint from this sensible young teacher. One has often noticed with a little regret that the day when callers are not expected is the day that they are sure to come. To scurry about in nervous haste, slipping off one frock and donning another, pinning on a bow with hands that tremble, looking remorsefully at tumbled hair, and wasting time that might be spent in the society of a friend, are extremely annoying results of being too lazy to make an afternoon toilet. Unless there are excellent reasons to the contrary, a woman should never let herself drift into heedlessness about the effect she produces by her looks.

Not vanity, but common sense prompts us to hold on to what beauty we have and heighten it in every simple, natural way by good health, becoming attire and immaculate neatness. In the item, for instance, of foot gear why should a woman shuffle about in buttonless shoes or slippers down at the heel when a very little effort will enable her to be neatly shod in the house as well as out?

An afternoon toilet need not be expensive. The least costly gown, if it fit well and be spotless, conveys an idea of its wearer's sweet purity just as really as if it were a silk that would stand alone.

The Oklahoma Mine Disaster

ON August 26, the mining town of Haileyville, Pittsburg County, Oklahoma, was the scene of a terrible disaster, in which twenty-nine miners lost their lives.

Joseph T. Lewis

The first reliable story of the calamity is told in a letter from Joseph T. Lewis, mine foreman, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which we give below:

"Between 8 and 8.30 o'clock on the morning of August 26, all the miners with other laborers were busily engaged in their daily task far away from the mouth of the shaft. At the bottom of the shaft there were quantities of black oil stored, for greasing the car wheels. There was nothing alarming to make their escape. There were 133 souls in the mine that morning; 103 came out alive. It was a sad spectacle all day; crowds of people from far and near had come to render assistance. Next morning, all the bodies were recovered and conveyed to their homes for immediate burial. The cost was borne by the company. The company also promptly extended assistance to the needy.

"The following are the names of the known dead at the Hailey mine: Alex. Ross, 21 years; Louis Manze, 40; Joseph Tobacchi, 38; W. H. Parker, 40; James Sedino, 28; Joe Giacomo, Sr., 42; Dan Giacomo, Sr., 45; Rick Giacomo, 17; Walter Jones, 35; George Glendenning, 40; Lewis Lewis, 17; Lee Harney, 35; Roy Pierce, 30; Ross Milton, 21; Dominic Maricino, 16; Robert Webster, 40; Mick Yocabich; Willie Smith, 16; Leno Fisher, 24; Richard Brown; Auto Delmonico, 38; Jack Sanage, Felise Strau; Joe Gallagher, 42; John Morrett, John Schultz, Louis Riemann; John Tobacchi, 42; Andrew Karuko.

"Most of the dead were interred the next day. It was sad to see so many weeping over their loved ones. Some in this, nor did any apprehend danger when getting near to it with their naked lights; but in this case had been inadvertently substituted an inferior grade of oil of a most dangerous and fiery character. This should be a warning to all companies to make a test of these goods before allowing them to enter the mines.

"The explosion occurred when some one came too close to it with his lighted lamp, yet he himself was saved. Heroic effort was made to extinguish the flames, but to no avail. They got beyond control and soon started to burn the timbers. The draft was so great that the fire quickly spread to the inner workings, and great haste had to be made to stop the fan which created a circulation (or air current) of 30,933 cubic feet per minute. Exhausted by heat and smoke, the mine foreman hurried to reach the fan house, as he could not leave anyone else to do this thing, while so many lives were in danger. The air current was checked, affording more time to those below to escape. Some doubtless got bewildered when they saw the smoke, and made for the entrance of the shaft, for a number of victims were found huddled together, evidently having been suffocated by the dense smoke which poured out to meet them. There were other ways of escape, but they probably could not reach those in time, for the current was strong and carried along the smoke with great rapidity before it was possible to reach the fan house, which was nearly half a mile distant.

"In all our sadness in losing our dear ones (my own son Louis among the number), we feel grateful to God for the presence of mind displayed by many and for the assistance rendered to those in the mine who were enabled of the bodies were badly mutilated, indicating that they struggled very hard for their lives."

The mine foreman is a native of Wales, and has been a resident of Haileyville for many years. He is an earnest Christian and a member and deacon of the First Baptist Church, and his wife and daughter are also members.

The Real Bryan. Being extracts from the speeches and writings of "a well-rounded man." Compiled by Richard L. Metcalfe. Personal Help Publishing Company, Des Moines, Ia. The charms of childhood are brought to bear upon the voters of America, in the pretty picture of Mr. Bryan and his grandchildren which forms the frontispiece of this cheap-looking but legibly-printed volume. Here are extracts from articles which have appeared in the Commoner and elsewhere, as well as parts of Mr. Bryan's most characteristic speeches. On the whole, they give, probably, a much fairer idea of the man than could any amount of outside description.

Where the old wall-paper is solid on the wall, charming and beautiful results can be secured by applying Alabastine directly over it, particularly on ingrain paper and even striped paper, providing there are no strong aniline colors or raised figures.

Alabastine comes only in sealed packages and any dealer will supply it if you are careful to ask for Alabastine.

Alabastine

The Sanitary Wall Coating

Alabastine will give you an even, velvety surface which reflects the light instead of absorbing it, thus making your rooms brighter and more cheerful. Best results are obtained where the paper can be removed, for then Alabastine becomes a part of the wall.

Alabastine is made from pure Alabaster rock, powdered. Simply mixed with cold water and applied with a flat brush, it adheres to the wall by its own cementing powers. You can do the work yourself, or employ an experienced decorator.

A COURSE IN ESPERANTO

LESSON No. 20—By Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

Esperanto in Schools and Colleges

THE school and college days are here again. All pupils in our public schools must learn English, no matter what their nationality is. This they must do to fit them for citizenship in the United States. It is also desirable that they should learn a common language that will fit them for citizenship in the world, so that wherever they may travel, either for business or pleasure, they will have at command a language in which they can be understood anywhere. Mr. E. K. Harvey, of Boston, recently spent several weeks in Russia, and during that time spoke nothing but Esperanto.

As to Esperanto in colleges: when Oxford, England, sets the pace, and establishes examinations in Esperanto, as it did on July 24, 1908, it would seem that in all the world colleges must soon follow that way. In fact, Esperanto is already being taught in several of our colleges and schools of higher learning, either as a part of the curriculum or as an optional course. Among them may be named: Harvard, Princeton, Pennsylvania, Chicago, Southern California, Ohio State University, Kansas State Agricultural College, Massachusetts Agricultural College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Polytechnic Institute of Worcester, Roxbury High School, etc.

College boys like songs and "yells," and it is proposed now to give them such material with which to rally the forces for Esperanto.

The number has increased from less than five hundred to over seven hundred. Each man has his own little house, and a good sized garden, in which many of them have planted pepper and rubber and vegetables. Besides this, the planting of rice has been more than successful.

The spiritual growth of the colony has been great. The people are settled at five different points on the Rejang River, and each settlement now has its own little church, preacher, school, Sunday School and prayer meeting. Among the natives of Borneo the Methodist Church has yet no organized work, two missionaries having all they can do to attend to the spiritual and temporal welfare of the colonists, but the people visit us, and whenever there is an opportunity we tell them as much of the Gospel as we think they can understand. That is not very much, for, having no religious terms of their own, it is hard to make them comprehend the meaning of such words as "salvation," "redemption," etc.

The Chinese traders of Sibü, with their wives and families, receive the missionaries cordially. Indeed, a few have inquired concerning Christianity, and have gone so far as to say that they think the life of a Christian is more care-free and happier than that of an idolater. When asked to attend church they say they would like to, but are ashamed. We are praying that

La vort' stranga sonis tra nokto silenta:
Excelsior!

Li vidis, en loĝoj feliĉaj, tre ĉarme
Jen brulis la fajro lumante kaj varme;
En sup' glaciaĵoj minace sin trenis;
El lipoj junulaj sopiro elvenis:

Excelsior!

"Ne provu la pason!" maljuna hom' diris,
En supro sin nigra ventego kuntiris.
Profunda la akvo, ŝiranta la ondo!"
Kaj laŭte eksonis la klara respondo:

Excelsior!

"Halt!" diris knabino. "Kap' via de l' laco Sur tiu ĉi brusto ripozu en paco!"
Larm' staris en blua okulo brilante,
Sed tamen respondis junul' sopirante:

Excelsior!

"Ho! gardu vin antaŭ branĉ' velka de l' pino, Ho! gardu vin antaŭ terura lavino!"
Lin laste por nokto salutis pasanto;
El alte rediris la malaperanto:

Excelsior!

Kun al la ĉielo levita rigardo
La piaz monaĥoj de l' Sankta Bernhardo
En frua mateno la preĝojn murmuris,
Kaj krio skuanta la aeron trakuris:

Excelsior!

Migranto, duone en neĝo fosita,
De l' hundo fidela li estis trovita;
Li tenis ankoraŭ en mano glacia
Standardon kun stranga devizo jen tia:

Excelsior!

Kaj en duonlumo la griza, malvarma,
Li kuŝis senviva, sed bela kaj ĉarma,
Kaj de malproksime, el klara ĉielo,
Defalis la voĉo per falo-de stelo:

Excelsior!

NOTE.—Instead of explaining words used as we have hitherto done, our students are advised to compare the Esperanto form with the English, a copy of which is certainly possessed by every one.

WANTED BOY or GIRL

Quality Mfg. Co. Hartford, Conn.

"Thy Gentleness Hath Made Me Great"

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WHEN Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, was five years old, his grandfather, father and uncle, King Saul and his two sons, were all slain in battle on one day. Fear in the royal household was so great that the survivors fled. The nurse gathered up Mephibosheth, the youngest, in her arms, but in her haste let him fall, and he was crippled for life.

Growing up Poor

Poverty as well as lameness was the lot of Prince Mephibosheth because what had pertained to Saul and Jonathan had been forfeited. A rich, kind man named Meribah received him into his own house and provided for him. A poor boy may not always find a rich friend. It will often be better for him if he must depend upon his own resources to make his way in the world, for it is thus that our powers are developed. Trace back the lives of men whom we call "great," either in business or public life, and we shall find that many of them were poor boys. It is the poor boy, not the rich one, who has the best chance in this world. While poverty strengthens moral fibre in many instances, wealth weakens it. Dr. Peloubet says: "The school of adversity has more noble graduates than any university in the world," and in this connection he tells the story of Sir Henry Fawcett, one of the most useful men in England. When very young, he was accidentally shot by his father and blinded. He was so anxious to comfort his father that he made great efforts to accomplish more than he would have done with sight. He became a college professor, a member of parliament, and postmaster-general of England.

An Old Family Servant

Such was Ziba. He had been a servant in the house of Saul. And he probably came with Michal, the daughter of Saul, to live in the family of David when Michal became David's wife. It was just like a faithful old servant to keep in mind the crippled son of his former master, and just like him to bring that unfortunate one to King David's notice, when an inquiry was made of him.

When Ziba spoke a kind word for Mephibosheth it wrought a wonderful change in the latter's life. King David sent royal wagons to bring the crippled prince to the palace. King David had not forgotten the covenant which he had "cut" with Jonathan twenty-five years and more before, when each loved the other as his own soul (see Reference Bible, I. Sam. 20: 16, also The Blood Covenant by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, pp. 270, 271). Under this covenant the sons and daughters of each party to it were considered a sacred trust by the other. It was the memory of that which caused King David to make inquiry of the old family servant concerning the possibility of some of them being alive.

This should remind us that we are in a covenant with Christ, and that we are love-bound by his blood shed for us and imparted to us to do all we can for his "little ones," which term includes those about us who are in any sort of need. President Abraham Lincoln once remarked: "I want it said of me by those who know me best that I have always plucked a thistle and planted a flower wherever a flower would grow."

Some one has given this good advice: "Be pleasant and kind to those around you. The man who stirs his cup with an icicle spoils the tea and chills his own fingers."

His infirmity caused the prince to compare himself with a dog, and he trembled like a frightened animal in the presence of the king. How the heart of David must have been wrung as he looked at him, and thought of him as the son of his beloved Jonathan! How gracious were the words of David as he spoke to him and promised that all of the lands which were his inheritance should be restored to him! In a moment Mephibosheth was raised from poverty to abundant wealth. But that was not all. Still more precious was the personal friendship which David showed to him for his father's sake when he said, "Thou shalt eat bread at my table continually." The Arabs say, when they know not where they are going, "We will ramble on toward God's gate." That day God's gate opened at the palace of King David.

Christian Endeavorers were once asked to give an account of the kindest act they had ever seen. One told of a student who volunteered to go with five fellow students who had been exposed to small-pox, and were being sent to a deserted farmhouse for quarantine. All of that student's vacation was passed caring for the sick, for they all came down with the small-pox, and he alone was left to nurse, cook and wash for them. He took his task cheerfully, and was often heard singing Christian Endeavor hymns. Another told of a mother far from home who lost her only little one. She was almost crazed by grief, and had no money with which to buy the metallic casket required by the railroad company. A man who had himself known sorrow obtained a casket, saying to the dealer, "If she does not send the money I will pay for it." A mother's reason was probably saved and angels must have wept with joy.

The Cripple at Home

A home was provided for Mephibosheth and his family by the kindness and generosity of King David. And it was no mean establishment; for Ziba and his fifteen sons and twenty servants were set apart to till the land and bring in the fruits for Mephibosheth, who was still to eat at the King's table as one of his own sons. And the old servant rejoiced in what he was permitted to do for his old master's son. And dearer to Mephibosheth than any others could have been were Ziba and his sons for his servants. It was an almost ideal relation between master and servants.

"Mephibosheth had a young son whose name was Micha." We are not told his age, but he was a boy. We may be very sure that King David took an interest in this little grandson of his beloved Jonathan, and considered that he had a covenant duty to him. Probably it was largely for his sake that a separate house was established for Mephibosheth. Yes, there was a boy in the case. There was a "boy problem" then as to-day. And in all probability it was a boy with a heritage of weakness. King David surrounded him with the best of conditions. He set him in the midst of a garden well tilted.

In his book, The Winning of a Boy, Dr. Merrill says: "I would not in any degree minimize the importance of saving the man at the worst end of his life; only that gives such small returns compared with the limitless balance of power that is conserved when we catch the citizen early." It is the Christ-like touch that wins.

Among the hills of Galilee,
Through crowded city ways,
The Christ of God went forth to heal
And bless in olden days.
The sinning and the sad of heart
In anxious throngs were massed
To catch the great Physician's eye
And touch him as he passed.

Have we not in our hours of need
His seamless garment pressed,
And felt his tender human hand
On us in blessing rest?
Yet still in crowded city streets
The Christ goes forth again,
Whenever touch of human hand
Bespeaks good will to men.

We are not told of any reward which David had because of kindness

LIFE'S ROAD

Smoothed by Change of Food.

Worry is a big load to carry and an unnecessary one. When accompanied by digestion it certainly is cause for the blue. But the whole trouble may be easily thrown off and life's road be made easy and comfortable by proper eating and the cultivation of good cheer. Hear what a Troy woman says:

"Two years ago I made the acquaintance of Grape-Nuts and have used the food of a day and sometimes twice, ever since.
"At the time I began to use it life was a burden. I was for years afflicted with bilious sick headache, caused by indigestion, a nothing seemed to relieve me.
"The trouble became so severe I had to leave my work for days at a time.
"My nerves were in such a state I could not sleep and the doctor said I was on the verge of nervous prostration. I saw an advertisement concerning Grape-Nuts and bought a package for trial.
"What Grape-Nuts has done for me is certainly marvelous. I can now sleep like a child, am entirely free from the old trouble and have not had a headache in over a year. I feel like a new person. I have recommended it to others. One man I knew nothing but Grape-Nuts, while working the ice all winter, and said he never felt better in his life."
"There's a Reason."

*International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 18, 1908. David's Kindness to Jonathan's Son. I. Sam. 9: 1-13. GOLDEN TEXT: "Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving each other." Eph. 4: 32.

was able to show to the son of man; but undoubtedly his heart's ardor was so warmed by the south wind of love that the spices of happiness and joy flowed out. The words, "I am more blessed to give than to receive," had not then been written in the Book, but they had already been written on the tables of the heart.

Here is a story of a little girl who received double reward for a kindness shown. The family of a petty official at Berlin was recently treated to an agreeable surprise owing to the charitable disposition of the smallest member of their little household—a three-year-old girl. During the month of April he met, sitting on a bench in the public square near her home, an old, poor but neatly clad man, who attracted her attention by his sad looks and desolate air. Thinking he must be hungry, she stepped up to him and, without question, "Want a piece of pie?" she resolutely handed him half of her simple lunch. The man appeared somewhat perplexed, but smilingly received the piece with thanks, and ate it. From that day both mightily and gently be seen together engaged in lively conversation, the little girl never forgetting to offer her old friend a bit of her lunch, which she was in the habit of eating in the open air, playing about on the lawn, nor admitting of any refusal on his part to take at least a little bit. At the beginning of the month Hermine's morning returned home with the distressing news that the "poor" man had appeared. Neither had he been seen for several days after when Hermine's father received an unexpected summons to appear at court. Hermine was told that the "poor old man," who really was a wealthy citizen of Berlin, had left his whole fortune to little Hermine. His will contained the following paragraph: "I had despaired of the whole world, and those who were nearest and dearest to me had deceived me. Thus I pronounced all, for what I desired I was unable to obtain. I became a miser, because my liberality was only rewarded with ingratitude. Nearing the end of my course I was mightily touched by a child's heart, which reconciled me with humanity. It was only for a short time; but if I had millions to bestow, those few moments would not be paid for too dearly. May my wealth serve my little friend for better ends than it did me, who never knew how to appreciate or to expend it."

The Divinest Quest

strivers with shame. You boys that are unconverted, and are going out into the world without God and without hope, may bring equal sorrow to your families. You are to seek the Lord also with a divided heart. Some seek God with a divided heart. The promises of God are very full and very precious just at this point. "When thou saidst, Seek my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." "Blessed be they that seek me with the whole heart." "And ye shall seek me, and shall find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart." Blessed is the man who can say, "My heart is fixed, O God." You can trust that man; he will mount to something, but when man is drawn this way by the world, and that way by Christ, the apostle says of him, "A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways." Men never win in life unless their hearts are fixed. Why did Ericsson win? His heart was fixed. See him in a bathhouse constructing a plan for a screw-propeller. Look at Edison studying his lessons when he was a newsboy on the New York Central road. See the crazy son of a blacksmith, writing Sir Humphry Davy, asking for employment, and Sir Humphry putting him to washing bottles. And of him finally said, "He is the greatest experimental philosopher the world has ever known." His heart was fixed. And so I close by urging you to begin today by casting yourself fully upon God through Jesus Christ. It is your last chance, man. Disraeli once said a great truth when he said, "The secret of success in life is for a man to rely for his opportunity." I would like to speak to you in this closing half-hour, as if I might never speak to you again. Will you seek God just now? Come just as you are; come just now in your helplessness. Too long you have waited; delay no longer. Seek the Lord now, for now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation.

Answered Prayers

K. T., New York. "I desire to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer."

A Reader, Ohio. "I desire to acknowledge to the world that God has answered many prayers."

M. M. V., Kansas. "I wish to acknowledge, through our much loved paper THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an answer to my prayer which brought relief and comfort to our home."

Reader. "I promised the Lord if he would help me out of a great difficulty I would acknowledge it in this way. He answered my prayer and everything is all right."

J. S., Maryland. "Some one I loved was in great trouble. I prayed as earnestly as I knew how for affairs to turn out satisfactorily, and promised God if they did to acknowledge it publicly. He answered my prayer."

A Friend, New York. "My daughter was ill for a long time, and I promised God if he would spare her I would acknowledge it through the answered prayer column, and he has spared her; and although not real well, she is improving and I thank the Lord for it."

H. M. C., New York. "I know that God hears and answers prayers. I asked him to show me the way through my difficulties and I would acknowledge it to the world. He fulfilled his part faithfully and I am trying to do mine, and my faith in God and prayer is stronger to-day than ever before."

An Old Subscriber from Washington. "I want to tell you how I enjoy the answered prayers in the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD, and want to send my testimony that the Lord does answer prayer. Many, many times in my long life has he answered mine. Lately I prayed for a certain object and it was granted in a very unexpected way."

"Where can I invest my money so that it will be safe and where I can have it when needed, and yet so it will bring me reasonable earnings when invested?" This question will be answered to your satisfaction if you will write the Industrial Savings & Loan Co., whose advertisement appears on page 797.

"I knew him before he was a mattress."

"Perhaps you slept on him"

One-third of your life is spent in bed—have it a clean and comfortable bed.

If the Ostermoor Mattress is as clean, comfortable and sanitary as we claim, how can you sleep on a hair mattress which you know cannot be really clean and which is seldom comfortable after its newness has worn off?

The New York World, Dec. 18th, tells of John Cullen, who worked at the curled hair industry in Sing Sing Prison. He had a sore on his neck and rubbed it with the disease malignant, common among South American cattle.

How do you know what kind of hair you buy?

You don't, and what's more not one dealer in ten knows one grade of hair from another, except by the price he pays.

Without fear of contradiction we claim that the Ostermoor is the most sleepinducing and restful mattress ever made.

Make us prove this—we can do it if you will let us.

We will prove that the Ostermoor retains its shape and resiliency for 30 years—never sags or lumps—because it is built—not stuffed.

That it is vermin-proof, damp-proof, dust-proof.

because a progressive competitor has the right to sell the genuine.

You cannot be deceived—unless you wish to be. The name Ostermoor and our famous trade-mark label is sewn on the end of every Ostermoor Mattress ever made. See that it is there—or let us know about it.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend. Margaret investigates the mills and sees many children at work. She informs Frank that she is going to live among them, and he asks if she will stay, saying her presence means everything to one at Belcourt. She thinks he refers to his brother Ned, and says, "No." She undertakes her work at "Mill House," but wonders why McGinnis does not come to see her. At last he says he has to stay away because he loved her. She thinks that she reciprocates his affection and they become engaged. Ned returns to announce that Frank has been ill, and they are all coming home. Margaret and Patty go to New York to try to find the twin sisters of Patty. They find Clarabella a teacher at Mont-Lawn, and Arabella a missionary helper in New York. The latter comes back with Margaret to help her in her work. Frank Spencer returns much changed.

ONE by one the days passed. At Belcourt Margaret was fast regaining her old buoyant health, and was beginning to talk of taking up her "work" again, much to the distress of her family. Frank Spencer, too, was better, though in spite of Margaret's earnest efforts the curiously troubled look had not gone from his eyes. It even seemed deeper and more poignant sometimes, Margaret thought.

Never before had Margaret known quite so well the man who had so carefully guarded her since childhood. She suddenly began to appreciate what he had done for her all those years. She realized, too, with almost the shock of a surprise, how young he had been when the charge was entrusted to him, and what it must have meant to a youth of twenty to have a strange, hysterical little girl ten years old thrust upon him so unceremoniously. She realized it all the more fully now that the pleasant intercourse of the last two weeks had seemed to strip from him the ten years' difference in their ages. They were good friends, comrades. Day after day they had read and sung and walked together, and she knew that he had exerted every effort to make her happy.

More keenly than ever now she regretted that she must bring sorrow to him in acknowledging her engagement to Bobby. She knew very well that he would not approve of the marriage. Had he not already pleaded with her to stay there at Belcourt as Ned's wife? And had he not always disapproved of her having much to say to McGinnis? It was hard, indeed, in the face of all this to grieve him. But it must be done. In two days now he was going back to the mills. There was really no excuse for any further delay. She must send for Bobby.

There was a thunderstorm on the night Bobby McGinnis came to Belcourt. The young man arrived just before the storm broke, and was ushered at once by Margaret herself to the little den where Frank Spencer sat alone. Mrs. Merideth had gone to bed with a headache, and Ned was out of town, so Margaret had the house to herself. For a time she wandered aimlessly about the living room and the great drawing-room, then she sat down in a shadowy corner which commanded a view of the library and of the door of the den. She shivered at every clap of thunder, and sent a furtive glance toward that close-shut door, wondering if the storm outside were typical of the one which even then might be breaking over Bobby's head.

It was very late when McGinnis came out of the den and closed the door behind him—so late that he could stop for only a few words with the girl, who hurried across the room to meet him. His face was gray-white, and his whole appearance showed the strain he had been under for the last two hours.

"Mr. Spencer was very kind," he said huskily in response to the question in Margaret's eyes. "At first, of course, he—but never mind that part. — He has been very kind, but I — I can't tell you now—all that he said to me. Perhaps—some other time." McGinnis was plainly very much moved. His words came brokenly, and with long pauses.

For some time after her lover had gone Margaret waited for Frank Spencer to come out and speak to her; but the door of the den remained fast shut, and she finally went up stairs without seeing him.

The next few days at Belcourt were hard for all concerned. Before Margaret had come down stairs on the morning following McGinnis's call, Frank Spencer had told his sister of the engagement; and after the first shock of the news was over, he had said constrainedly, and with averted eyes:

"There is just one thing for us to do, Della—or rather, for us not to do. We must not drive Margaret away from us. She has full right to marry the man she loves, of course; and if we are too censorious it will result only in our losing her altogether. It isn't what we want to do, but what we must do. We must accept him—or lose her. I—I'm afraid I forgot myself at first last night," went on Frank, hurriedly, "and said some pretty harsh things. I didn't realize what I was saying until I saw the look on his face. McGinnis is a straightforward, manly young fellow—we must not forget that, Della."

"But think of his position," moaned Mrs. Merideth.

Frank winced.

"I know," he said. "But we must do our best to remedy that. I shall advance him and increase his pay at once, of course, and eventually he will become one of the firm, if Margaret—marries him."

Mrs. Merideth burst into tears. "How can you take it so calmly, Frank?" she sobbed. "You don't seem to care at all!"

Frank Spencer's lips parted, then

ed again. Perhaps it was just as we, after all, that she should not know just how much he did—care. It may not be myself I'm thinking of, he said at last quietly. "I want Margaret—happy." And he turned away.

Margaret was not happy, however, as the days passed. In spite of every effort to act as if everything was as usual, nobody succeeded in doing so; and at last Margaret announced her determination to go back to the Mill House. She agreed, however, to make a "visit," for Mrs. Merideth had died tragically.

But, Margaret dear, if we are going to lose you altogether by and by, you will give us all your time and love, that you can!"

CHAPTER XXXVI

BOBBY McGINNIS wondered sometimes that summer why he was not happier. Viewed from the standpoint of an outsider, he surely had enough to make any man happy. He was young, strong and in a position of trust and profit. He was, moreover, engaged to the girl he loved, and that girl was everything that was good and beautiful, and he saw her every day. All this Bobby knew—and he still he wondered.

He saw a good deal of Margaret these days. Their engagement had come to be an accepted fact, and the flurry of surprise and comment had passed. The Mill House, with Bobby in charge, was steadily progressing. Margaret had taken up her work again with fresh zest, but, true to her promise to Mrs. Merideth, she spent many a day, and sometimes two or three days, at Belcourt. All this, however, did not interfere with Bobby seeing her—for he, too, went to Belcourt in accordance with Margaret's expressed wishes.

But, Bobby," Margaret had said in response to his troubled remonstrances, "are you not going to be my husband? Of course you are! Then you must come to meet my friends." And Bobby Bobby McGinnis found himself in a new position then. He was Mr. Robert McGinnis, the accepted suitor of Miss Margaret Kendall, and as such he was introduced to Margaret's friends.

It was just here, perhaps, that misery began for Bobby. He was not made at ease in his new, well-fitting evening clothes than he would have been in the garb of Sing Sing; nor did he feel less conspicuous among the gay throng about Margaret's chair than he would if he had indeed worn the prison stripes.

Bobby saw it, he was in prison, beyond the four walls of which lay a world he had never seen—a world of beautiful music and fine pictures; a world of great books and famous men; a world of travel, ease and pleasure. He could but dimly guess the meaning of all of what was said, and the conversation might as well have been conducted in a foreign language so far as here was any possibility of his understanding it. Big, tall, and silent, he stood as if apart. And because he was apart—he watched.

He began to understand, then, why he was unhappy—yet he was not watching himself, he was watching Margaret. She knew this world—this world that was outside his prison walls; and she was at home in it. There was a light in her eye that he had never brought there, though he had seen it sometimes when she had been particularly interested in her work at the Mill House. As he watched her now, he caught the quick play of color on her cheeks, and heard the ring of enthusiasm in her voice. One subject after another was introduced, and for each she had question, comment, or jest. Not once did she appeal to him. But why should she, he asked himself bitterly. They—those others near her—knew this world. He did not know it.

Sometimes the mills were spoken of, and she was questioned about her work. Then, indeed, she turned to him—but he was not the only one to whom she turned; she turned quite as frequently to the man who was seldom far away from the sound of her voice when she was at Belcourt—Frank Spencer.

McGinnis had a new object for his brooding eyes then; and it was not long before he saw that it was to this same Frank Spencer that Margaret turned when subjects other than the mills were under discussion. There seemed to be times, indeed, when she apparently heard only his voice, and recognized only his presence, so intimate was the sympathy between them. McGinnis saw something else, too—he saw the look in Frank Spencer's eyes; and after that he did not question again the cause of his own misery.

Sometimes McGinnis would forget all this or would call it the silly fears of a jealous man who sees nothing but adoration in every eye turned upon his love. Such times were always when Margaret was back at the Mill House, and when it seemed as if she, too, were inside his prison walls with him, leaving that hated, unknown world shut forever out. Then would come Belcourt—and the reaction.

"She does not love me," he would moan night after night as he tossed in sleepless misery. "She does not love me—but she does not know it—yet. I never, never can make her happy. I might have known—I might have known!"

CHAPTER XXXVII

THE Spencers remained at Belcourt nearly all summer with only a short trip or two on the part of Mrs. Merideth and Ned. The place was particularly cool and delightful in summer, and this season it was more so than usual. House-parties had always been popular at Belcourt, and never more so than now. So popular, indeed, were they, that Margaret suspected them to be sometimes merely an excuse to gain her presence at Belcourt.

There were no guests, however, on the night that the mills caught fire. Even Margaret was down at the Mill House. Mrs. Merideth, always a light sleeper, was roused at the first blast of the shrill whistle. From her bed she could see the lurid glow of the sky, and with a cry of terror she ran to the window. The next moment she threw a heavy bath-robe over her shoulders and ran to Frank Spencer's room across the hall.

"Frank, it's the mills—they're all afire!" she called frenziedly. "Oh, Frank, it's awful!"

From behind the closed door came a sudden stir and the sound of bare feet striking the floor; then Frank's voice.

"I'll be out at once. And, Della, see if Ned's awake, and if you can call up Peters. We shall want the motor-car."

Mrs. Merideth wrung her hands. "Frank—Frank—I can't have you go—I can't have you go!" she moaned hysterically; yet all the while she was hurrying to the telephone that would give the alarm and order the car that would take him.

In five minutes the house was astir from end to end. Lights flashed here and there, and terrified voices and hurried footsteps echoed through the great halls.

Trusting in the Lord

By MRS. M. BAXTER.

MR. GEORGE MULLER, of Bristol, was in the habit of reading the whole Bible three times every year. In the days of George Herbert, a company of Christians whom he knew, living in parsonage near his own, used to repeat the Psalms through from memory every week, and the whole of the four Gospels every month. Whatever else they did not know these people knew their Bibles and made them the rule of their hearts within and their lives without. It was the knowledge of the Bible which gave to a nation's character its solidity and reliability.

Why should we "forget not" and "keep" God's commands? "For length of days, and long life, and peace shall they add unto thee." Think of the people you can remember who, in spite of much labor and many trials, have the mark of God's peace upon them, and live on to seventy, eighty, sometimes ninety or a hundred. Are they not for the most part those who have lived on the Word, and drawn their joy and their strength from God, through his Word? But what do his words and commandments teach us? "Mercy and truth"; his mercy to the guilty and undeserving, through the blessed atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ, but also his truth and righteousness in such a salvation, and in his faithfulness to us, and mercy and truth in us, in the new life which he gives to us that we, too, may walk uprightly. It pays for time and eternity to "forget not," and to keep from the heart, the Word of the living God. "So let not mercy and truth forsake thee; bind them upon thy neck"—as a bridle—"write them on the table of thine heart," so as to actuate thee. What then? "So shalt thou find favor and good understanding in the sight of God and man." Is it not worth while?

"Trust in the Lord with all thine heart and lean not to thine own understanding." God knows everything beforehand; God is equal to every contingency. It is madness to go forward in our own strength and wisdom into a day, ignorant, weak, foolish, as we are. His desire is to get our confidence, and to have us walk with him all day. Lean not to thine own limited, half-informed, feeble understanding. Man loves to be self-reliant, and God calls us to be dependent, but not on man. Independent of man by being honorably dependent on him who knows all things, and who is omnipotent. He calls us to a life of filial confidence in him.

"In all thy ways acknowledge him," and then? He shall direct thy paths. Moses, who was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and was mighty in words and deeds, was not ashamed in every perplexity to fall on his face before God, to ask of him a right way; and if it were the dividing of a sea, if it were the provisioning of a nation in the wilderness, if it were a water supply for the host, it was not too much for such a God, so trusted, to dry up the sea, rain bread from heaven, and bring water out of the stony rock. He did direct his paths. And what a life of power was his!

"Be not wise in thine own eyes: fear the Lord, and depart from evil." Cain was wise in his own eyes, and his offering was not accepted. Pharaoh was wise in his own eyes; his boast was, "I know not the Lord, neither will I let the people go." So he came to destruction, and was forced by God to let the people go. King Saul was wise in his own eyes, but God rejected him, and he came to a sad, miserable end. A self-conceited man is above learning from others, and therefore remains ignorant, and he is soon surpassed by patient, plodding learners. What is the result of obedience to this command? "It shall be health to thy navel and marrow to thy bones." The man who ceases, by the grace of God, to be wise in his own eyes, who fears the Lord, and departs from evil, declares himself to be on God's side. It is an appeal to God to which he most abundantly responds.

In the past six years we have sold Kalamazoo stoves and ranges to thousands of readers of this journal—saving them $5, $8, $10, and as high as $30 and $35 on a single purchase. But, that doesn't do you any good, unless you let me quote you prices and show you what we can do for you. Isn't it to your interest, then, to get our prices and catalogue? When you buy, you want the best stove or range you can find, and you want to buy it as economically as possible. You want to make every dollar count. Let me show you how. Write for our catalogue and prices, and then compare the Kalamazoo, in both quality and prices with the best stoves and ranges you can find sold at retail. That's all we ask—just a simple comparison. And it's to your interest to make it.

How You Save Money

You deal directly with the manufacturers. You buy at actual factory prices. You save all dealers', jobbers' and middlemen's profits.

We doubtless can send you names of many satisfied users of the Kalamazoo right in your own country—people who have not only saved money, but have also secured a stove or range of extra quality. We pay the freight—you don't have to take even that risk.

Your banker can easily find out about our reliability, and you know that the editor of this paper would not print our advertisements, year after year, if we were not perfectly trustworthy. If you appreciate the advantage of economy in buying, you will at least let me quote you prices.

The PRUDENTIAL'S

Very Newest Idea In Life Insurance

At age 30, for $167.35 a year, during your life (a saving of $13.95 a month) your Family Will Receive after your death $50.00 Every Month for 20 years, or $12,000 in all!

SUPPOSE your salary should permanently cease to-day by your death, what would your family do? What have you provided for them in its place? THE PRUDENTIAL has a new and perfect plan. Read this carefully. Say you are 30 years old; a monthly income of $50.00 a month for your family for 20 years after your death, or $12,000 in all to them, would cost you now only $167.35 per year, or $13.95 per month during your life. Think of what your family could do with a check of $50.00 sent them on the first of EVERY MONTH, EVERY YEAR for 20 years by The Prudential. If your wife should die within the 20 years the money would still go to your children or other heirs for the remainder of the 20 years. Under this plan the safe investment of your life insurance money is guaranteed by THE PRUDENTIAL. In other words you can practically arrange in advance yourself for the proper investment of your life insurance money through this new policy of THE PRUDENTIAL instead of leaving it for your wife or children to do. These checks will be sent each month by THE PRUDENTIAL to your heirs and THE PRUDENTIAL has the Strength of Gibraltar to guarantee the payments.

The checks will supply the money necessary to buy food, clothing, rent and education to those whom you now support, and the money will come regularly each and every month for 20 years, mind you. At slightly higher cost, the income could be made to continue for life.

Give to every mother in America even a small income, and in the strength of her character, patriotism and devotion to home and family, she will keep the family together and the children at school. It is within your power to make her task as light as possible. Will you do it?

Send to-day for information of this wonderful new home-protecting policy. It will put you under no obligation and will give you a plan guaranteeing support and education for those most dear to you in case you should be taken away.

Fill out a postal card now, stating your age, occupation, and the amount you think you might be able to save each week or month towards this kind of a policy, and mail it to us to-day. You will be under no obligation and the information will be held strictly confidential.

After Death—What?

No other question has so deeply agitated thinking men and women from time immemorial. Dr. Madison C. Peters in this his latest book handles it with incomparable skill.

In a simple but scholarly manner he discusses "The State of the Soul between Death and the Resurrection," "What Is Heaven and How to Reach It," "What the Heavenly Host Means," "The Old Testament on Immortality," "Reunions in Heaven," and numerous other absorbing subjects, including a most consolatory chapter on "Our Children in Heaven." Richly bound in Purple Vellum de Luxe. It contains about 100 large pages.

Mexican Ovens

IN THE HUMBLE HOMES OF MEXICO

ONE should go to Old Mexico to study its prevailing social conditions in detail; yet one can form a fair idea of Mexican life, among the common people at least, by taking a trip through the southwestern portion of the United States, especially through New Mexico.

The homes of the mysterious Cliff Dwellers, built centuries and centuries ago, would put to shame the adobe shelters of the Pacific slope; while the various household utensils, fabric and pottery found in the ruins of these pre-Columbians, whose story only conjecture tells with uncertain tongue, were superior to those found in many of the Mexican homes to-day.

There seems to be something in the very so-called civilization of the Mexicans that keeps them at a standstill, as if some terrible and powerful being long, long ago thundered in their ears in awful tone, "Thus far thou shalt go and no farther," and fearful that a great calamity would befall them if they undertook to advance, they obeyed and still obey implicitly.

The common people among the Mexicans and Indians of the Southwest build their houses, till the soil, weave their cloth, have the same customs and observe the same rites and ceremonies that their ancestors did more than three hundred years ago.

The oven for baking bread from meal made by crushing the corn between stones is still unimproved; the church where Indians and Mexicans alike worship is constructed as it was in the days of Cortez and the primitive ox-cart used in Old Mexico has its prototype in New Mexico.

The people in question are deeply religious. Every letter of the church ritual they know, but their religion is not the religion of Jesus Christ, for that purifies and uplifts. All that they desire is existence, and an existence too, that will give them the least exertion to maintain.

Filthy in person and in their homes, without any conception of virtue—ignorant, indolent and purposeless, they live on and on through their years and will so continue to live until the ranks of conscientious, Christian teachers is augmented to meet necessities. It seems to me, from my point of view, that the cry, "Come over into Macedonia and help us," sounds so plain and pitiful and heartfelt, that there should be generous responses from many sources.

Interest in missions beyond the seas is so great and takes up such a large part of the time in mission study classes that people sometimes forget the great need that lies just southward of our own en-perilous paths among the mountains, with light hearts so long as they are enabled to distribute their precious books.

The American Bible Society has its headquarters in the City of Mexico, on the street known as St. Joseph Royal, near the site of the ancient palace of Montezuma. The Bibles are displayed in the show windows. The books are placed with the covers open, so that the passer-by stops almost involuntarily to read some Scripture passage. The leaves are turned frequently to some new chapter. Most of the colporteurs are converted natives, and have been very successful in their work. They know better than any one else the difficulties of people who begin to take an interest in the Book of books, as they themselves have passed through them.

American interest in the spread of the Gospel in Mexico goes back to the days immediately following the Mexican War, when Bibles were sent across the border from Texas, and little bands of converts would assemble to worship God in secret. When liberty of thought was proclaimed in 1857, many of these converts were baptized, and organized churches, and appointed some of their own number to administer the sacraments.

The story of missionary effort in the State of Michoacan is a good illustration of what has been and may be accomplished among these people. There are now sixteen or more organized congregations, all within a radius of forty miles. Thirty-seven years ago there were none to hold up the torch of faith in this dark home of ignorance. A native preacher, Rev. Mr. Forcada, of the Presbyterian Church, began work amid great difficulties at Zitacuaro, in 1877, and discovered, greatly to his pleasure and astonishment, that a native Mexican convert had started a little Bible depository six years before, and that he had disposed of a large number of religious tracts and Bibles printed in the vernacular. The seed thus sown had prepared the field for active missionary effort. The present number of actual Christians may thus be traced back to the work done by an obscure colporteur.

lightened country in Old Mexico. The Protestant teachers and church members are doing a noble work with the resources at their command. Families and individuals are now being gradually won all over Mexico through the efforts of those modern knights of the cross, the colporteurs, who face violence from ignorant half-breeds and death in

THE Self-Surrendered Life

TEXTS:
II. Cor. 4; Eph. 3; Rom. 8: 26; Acts 26: 29
to the end

THESE passages are the words that I want to bring to you, and you take count of the circumstances, so that I shall not have need to even attempt the painting of this picture for you this morning: How Agrippa is there with all the emblems of his place and power; and how St. Paul is there in his presence, offering his defense; and with the badge of his physical weakness not only, but also with the token of his physical affliction upon him; for as he speaks the chains are dangling at his wrists. And yet as he looks into the face of this man he is saying that he would that this king might be such as he is, except the bonds. Now, sometimes such a wish as that might be the expression of a narrow and selfish spirit; but you call to mind how that this man has escaped the narrowness of Pharisaism. He left that behind him long time ago. And when he is uttering these words—that he would that the king on his throne might be such as he is—it is his life as well as his consciousness, as well as his purpose, which is speaking. And I want you to ask yourselves what that man is. What right has Paul to lift himself up and set himself out as a pattern for men? What right has St. Paul to make himself a sort of criterion by which other men in other places may be judged? Who is this man, anyhow, and what claim has he on the thought of Agrippa, and what claim has he on our thought? Of what fashion is his life? And so we come to see, first of all, that this man Paul represents the self-surrendered life.

Early Phases of Surrender

I read you a few moments ago his declaration in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and your own thought can fill out the outline of the picture that is thus suggested to you. You are ready to believe with me this morning, that if ever there were a self-surrendered life that life is the life of the man who faces Agrippa with that high and holy wish.

It was not always so. There were old days behind him; old days of childhood with its prattle and with its touches of love. Old days behind him when, as he looked into the face of her who gave him birth, he drank in that reverence of the patriarchs and prophets of which he was never thereafter rid. There were old days when the home poured into his heart and life all its treasures of love and of culture making for righteousness. And there were other old days when he sought, and sought successfully, to gain from the schools of his town such treasures of learning as they might hold for his enrichment; and when, with that mind—wonderfully alert, marvelously acquisitive—he goes about from place to place, he sees everywhere the things that are most worth while, and recognizes everywhere the things that are of supreme importance. That acquisitive mind of Saul of Tarsus was busy in the early days, and was not less busy when he came to take that post-graduate course under Gamaliel's instruction; and his life was not a self-surrendered life up to that point. There were phases of surrender that meant for him the sacrifice of ease for gain of learning.

The Critical Day

But there came a day at length—a day out there on the high road to Damascus—when all of our previous conceptions of this man as to God's ultimates, as to God's great objectives, as to that outermost rim that holds within its circle of light the lesser things, when all these conceptions were utterly changed. There came that hour when out of the heavens Jesus of Nazareth spake to him, when Saul of Tarsus did not know his name; did not recognize those lines of marvelous love written forever and ever upon the brow of Jesus of Nazareth. He had no thought that it was a King that spake to him, for he cried out and prostrated himself, saying: "Who art thou, Lord?" When the answer came, "I am Jesus of Nazareth whom thou persecutest," then Saul of Tarsus came to the Great Divide, so far as his own life was concerned, and to one of the Great Divides in the spiritual history of this world of ours. He saw then the crown upon the brow of the Divine King. He saw written in the face of the King the King's right to rule; and from that hour he was utterly surrendered to that King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible.

I would like to linger longer about that conception of St. Paul; how he seemed never to be doing aught but just to be waiting, that he might run on errands for Jesus. How constantly he is listening for the voice of Jesus that he might answer it with his swift obedience. How in his life he is saying it every time his lips move; every time his action writes its utterance upon the thought and memory of those in whose presence he lives. He is writing, "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." He is declaring constantly from that day, that there is nothing that he has to do that can possibly have right of way when there is something that Jesus wants him to do. His attitude is that of one who says, "I have no word to utter that is worth while in its utterance, or of enough moment, when Jesus gives me a message. And I have no plans, I have no purposes, I have no charts that are made for myself. I have given myself over utterly and absolutely and irrevocably. I have given myself over into the hands of Jesus of Nazareth."

Hearing the Divine Call

I was in Gouverneur, N. Y., a while ago, and I went into a telegraph office there and fell into conversation with the operator, and he told me that his call was the letter "G." And he said to me, "I am sometimes busy about the office, and the instrument is ticking off its messages, but I do not seem to hear them because they are not my letter. But the moment they sound 'G' I hear it, and I go and put my finger on the key. And I am sometimes sleeping, and the messages are sent through the darkness as well as the light; but I don't know them. But when the 'G' sounds, even if I am asleep I hear that, because it is my call; and I go and put my finger on the key to let them know that I am here." That seems to be the attitude of Paul to Jesus Christ. He knows what his call is; and whatever is transpiring in the world, whenever Jesus calls "Paul!" Paul is ready to answer, and ready to obey whatever the Master may have.

The self-surrendered life: "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live." And yet, after all, it is not I who am living; it is not the ego who is assertive; it is not the old personnel that is declarative of purpose and of wish. That is all gone long time ago. I am living, and yet, after all, it is not I, but it is Christ that liveth in me. The utterly surrendered life; the self-surrendered life that is emptied of itself, and emptied of its own purpose, and emptied of its own plans, and emptied of its own ambitions; emptied of its own self that it may be filled with the Christ-self. And so when I ask St. Paul again to tell me something more of this life, Paul would say not only that his life is a self-surrendered life but likewise that it is a Spirit-filled life.

Emptied of Self But God-Filled

I turned over a few pages of Paul's Epistles this morning to see whether, after all, Paul magnified the Holy Spirit, and see again and again that Paul knows all that a human mind needs to know of the Holy Spirit; knows of the Holy Spirit's help when down here on the earth we pour out our petition, and are conscious of the fact that "The Spirit maketh intercession for us with groanings that cannot be uttered." Paul had gotten far enough along to know about the strength that comes by the Holy Spirit; far enough along to understand how that there is vision and assurance of the Holy Spirit; but I read you from the Epistles that other word that declares St. Paul's consciousness of the fact that a life that is emptied of itself can be filled. Paul would say that the life emptied of itself should be filled with the Divine Spirit; for in the spiritual world nature abhors a vacuum just as nature abhors a vacuum, according to the old declaration of science, in the physical world. I would not ask that man to empty his life of its purpose and plan and ambition unless he was ready to accept another purpose and another plan and another ambition. I would not have you go without purpose and without anticipated arrangement in your life; but I would that you might know about this man of men, when standing in the presence of Agrippa he arose to the height of his human consciousness, knowing as-surely that in so far as it was possible for him to be, his life was emptied of self, and God-filled, Christ-filled, Spirit-filled; that his life was filled with God.

That is a wonderful process, a wonderful thing—when those two processes that can never be divided the one from the other are accomplished in the human life. For you cannot be filled with the Spirit until you are emptied of yourself. You cannot be filled with God until your love for sin and selfishness is emptied out of your lives. Then the Divine Personnel shall possess you and lure you and shall declare ownership in you all the while. And so far as purpose and faith and consecration are concerned you will stand before God as Paul stands before King Agrippa, emptied of self, filled with the Spirit of the living God.

Paul's Great Confidence

Now what does St. Paul—in that life emptied of self and filled with the Spirit, when he is supremely anxious, out of his love's sake, that others should know of that emptying and that filling—what does he do? I would like to hear St. Paul get up in the Ocean Grove love-feast—and we would take off the time-limit! We would look up into his face and say, "Paul, tell us all that you can, now, about the utmost love of God." Paul is before Agrippa, and says, "I am empty of self, and I am filled with Spirit, O King Agrippa! When in that conscious self-surrender, and in that dedication of self unto God, I found something that I did not have the older days. The world in which I now live is not your little world any longer. My world is no longer bounded by the hills of Judea; no longer bounded by the great sea; no longer the little world that lies here under that canopy of blue. But since I received into my life the Spirit of the living God, O King Agrippa, I have great confidence, and I live now in a great world. The hands of the Almighty God have been pushing back the horizon lines beyond the sun and the moon and those great stars that send God's love-messages to me in the night. I am walking in this great world that can put its fetters on my wrists and on my feet; but since came to that moment of self-surrender—which the birth-hour of our larger liberty; when I lost myself, but found myself; when I said farewell to the past and faced the future, and the Divine, and the Eternal—since that hour I have been bruising my feet on the stones of the way; and more than once my poor back has felt the lash of the scourge and I have been shut in dungeon darkness again and again; but my conscious soul has had the wings of eagles, and I have mounted up and soared world upon world; I have caught vision of dominion, and principality, and power that I never dreamed of in that older day. O King Agrippa! I wish that you could climb up where I have climbed; for I am here, near to the very heart of God, and his great universe swings about me. Great confidence! Great confidence! O King Agrippa! There was a night after they had scourged me and made my feet fast in the stocks—and Silas was there with me—and we comforted each other with a little word, and prayed and sang together. And as we prayed and sang together the walls of the prison cell became glorious as the vision of banquet hall in the king's palace."

Amazing Grace

There came to me there marvelous revelation of God's amazing grace. And now I stand making declaration unto you and unto all the world that "this light affliction, which is but for a moment worketh out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. While we look not at the things that are seen, but at the things that are unseen (robes, and dominions, and thrones—the things that are seen—mountains, and galaxies of stars) the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are unseen are eternal." O King Agrippa, I wish that you would come up where I am! I wish that you could soar where I am!

You have often read in the 8th of Romans that declaration of how "All things work together for good to them that love God." O young man, do you love him enough to surrender to him? Do you love him enough, my sister, to yield your life to him today? He is calling you perhaps to service as a missionary, young man; he is calling you, sister, to

WHITE RIBBONERS TO MEET IN DENVER

Mrs. Frances H. Ensign, O.

Mrs. Frances Beauchamp, Ky.

Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, Va.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, President.

Mrs. Kara S. Root, Japan

Mrs. Harriet W. Brand, Ind.

Mrs. A. Hungerford, Colo.

THE thirty-fifth annual convention of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union will meet in Denver, Colo., October 23-28. It will be the climax to a year of more than ordinary achievement—one signalized by many God-given victories.

The big, new convention hall of Denver, the scene of the Democratic National Convention—capable of holding 11,000 people, is the forum selected for the great annual rally of the Women's Christian Temperance forces. The prominent participants will be the missionaries returned from foreign lands, chief among whom are Mrs. Kara Smart Root, who was the secretary of the Young Women's Branch in Japan; Miss M. A. Spencer, who was for years the capable, self-sacrificing president in the Foreign Auxiliary Women's Christian Temperance Union of Japan; and Miss Harriet S. Alling, the secretary.

The year 1908 has had a great record, and, it is claimed, will be the greatest year in the history of the temperance reform movement. It is stated that the record of saloon annihilation during the first six months of 1908 in the United States has excelled every record for a similar period during the past century. From January 1, 1908, to July 1, 1908, over 6,000 saloons were abolished by the votes of the people in the various States.

The greatest advances of the year have been the adoption of State prohibition in Mississippi and North Carolina, and the reaffirmation of the prohibition law in Maine. Encouraging progress has been made in Virginia, where eighty out of one hundred counties are free from saloons; eight out of nineteen cities are dry, and of the 162 incorporated towns only eleven have saloons. The greater part of Texas is already dry under the county option law, and if the legislature of 1909 obeys the wishes of the citizens voiced at the primaries, Texas will have a State prohibition law the coming year.

During 1908, prohibition sentiment has extended rapidly in the southwestern portion of Louisiana, where there is a State law imposing a fine of $100 and imprisonment of six months for bringing liquor into "dry" territory. Eleven districts in Missouri without saloons as compared with only two dry districts last year is the record for 1908. California has now five prohibition counties, while campaigns are under way in seven others. Vermont has reduced the number of no-license towns. Washington State and Montana have been aroused. Two-thirds of Oregon is dry. Nebraska people have been stirred by Mrs. Mary Armor's earnest exhortations.

"Arkansas dry in 1908" has been the slogan of White Ribbon workers in that State.

Throughout the country during the year the Christian Temperance women have been indefatigably at work, cheered by the strongholds already won for the cause. The Anti-Narcotic Section has been encouraged by the barring of cocaine from the mails. A new movement has been inaugurated by the Scientific Temperance Instruction Department, which has secured the establishment of a course of study on this subject in the curriculum of several colleges, and has urged that definite preparation for temperance instruction be part of teacher-training courses in Sunday Schools and churches. That there has been a great "slump" in whisky production is another cause for rejoicing among the White Ribboners. The rate of decrease at last report averaged forty-seven per cent. in the three States of greatest production—Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Maryland.

At the coming convention Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, of Maine, Miss Willard's chosen successor, will preside, aided as Miss Willard was by the able worker Miss Anna Gordon, vice-president at large. A new treasurer is chosen to take the place of the late Mrs. Harriet Brand, of Indiana, recently called to higher service.

service as a deaconess to-day. Are you ready and willing to consecrate your life to his service? He is calling you to give yourself to him—with all your sorrows, and with all your broken-heartedness, and with all your misgivings, and with all your loneliness. You know he is calling you to give yourself to him, to be what he wants you to be, and to go where he wants you to go. You have been sorrowing by yourself. Now go around and try to comfort that sorrowing soul in that little narrow street, where God's bright sunshine finds it difficult at times to penetrate. You have been feeling infirmity yourself; go out and tell some other weak man how the Everlasting Arms can undergird, uphold, and sustain, giving you whispers of comfort. Don't keep the whispers of love to yourself. God wants you to love him and show your love by the consecration of your life to him in some great service. Young man, what are you going to do with what God has given you? What are you going to do with your thought-powers, with your song-powers? Do you love him enough to surrender to him? How glad I would be if now the blessed Christ who has been wooing you would win you—if this morning some young man who has great ambition in the line of money-making would substitute for that the ambition to be just the man that God would want him to be. Are you loving him? It is a great thing to love him, and to go down in the darkness where he is going with your life. Listen to what this man says to Agrippa: He says, "Agrippa, all things work together for good to them that love God." Now I have been thinking of it as though the thorn and the scourge were the "all things" that were working "together for good to them that love God." I read that verse out of the Epistle to the Colossians, how that he made all things—thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers—and that all things were made by him, and all things were made for him. And then I went back to the 8th of Romans and read and read the "all things" of that Epistle to the Colossians, and I said to myself: Can it be, after all, that not only sickness and sorrow may work together for my good; but can it be that if I keep myself in the love of God I shall be "complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power"?

Then I caught a new vision of it: I was not down by the Atlantic any longer. I was not in a narrow place any longer. For a little while it seemed to me as though the full orbs of light were singing their song, "All things work together for good to them that love God!"

Do you wonder that Paul says, "O Agrippa, try it! Come up where I am, King Agrippa. It is a long way; but fly up in your purpose, in your ambition. Come up, that you may be such as I am."

I would like to tell you the whole story if I knew it. I would like to tell you as much as I do know about it if there were time for it. But I set up that man of the long ago opposite to you this hour. Into your presence I would lead him this morning. In your presence I would have him utter this word this morning; looking into your face and saying, "I would that you were such as I am!" Oh the blessed certainty of it! Oh the consolation of that assurance that comes by faith in the Son of God!

And so over the hills of the centuries I want you to look. You and I have been very narrow; very self-possessed, and self-possessing. I would that you might turn your faces and look up and see the face of Paul looking upon you this morning. Selfish in your getting and selfish in your giving. Oh hear this word of the great apostle: "Such as I am," young man, "Such as I am."

Just one other picture as you think of St. Paul: Think of him coming down to the end of that journey from the prison cell on his way to execution, accompanied by the Roman guard; going on his way to the Imperial City; and as he goes he is singing in his soul, "I am persuaded that neither life, nor death, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate me from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, my Lord." He is singing, "I am now ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." And now come with me to the place of execution, and as his poor aching head falls there in the dust, his brave spirit enters into those worlds of light where never the shadow comes, where never the sense of loneliness can enter, into the presence of God, where the glory is no longer hidden, but is fully revealed. Oh, we must wait until to-morrow to know the blessedness of the glory of our Lord! "Such as I am! Such as I am!" Are you willing to accept that as the standard of your life to-day? Are you willing to give all for Jesus Christ to-day? "Such as I am!" Why, before he left us he told how he was caught up into the heavens and heard the things that were unspeakable by human lips. He saw unutterable glory before him, and that glory he is enjoying in all its completeness to-day. "Such as I am," living in the presence of the Master. "Such as I am," with God's right hand outstretched to me. "Such as I am," with the blessed cross above me and beneath me, and lifting me up so that I glory in it more and more. "Such as I am," a slave to Jesus Christ. "Such as I am," with the Everlasting Arms beneath me. "Such as I am," with the grace of God abounding through me. "Such as I am," kept by faith through salvation. And he is saying to you and me this morning, "Come up to this level with me; come up to this level of living; to this place where you shall be given utterly to God."

Give yourselves to him now as never before. Dedicate yourselves to God for service; then the world shall be a blessing to you, and you shall become a blessing to the world, because you are such as Paul was.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST W. E. BIEDERWOLF and several others have organized a "Family Altar League." There is very evident today a sad lack of family worship in American homes.

—DR. WILLIAM EDGAR GEIL, the well-known writer and traveler, has sailed from San Francisco for the Orient. His ultimate destination is Tibet, and the unknown land beyond the Gobi Desert.

—MISSIONARY WILLIAM GREET of the Tehri Mission in the Himalayas, is now engaged in revising the Gospels in the dialect of that country, and the mountaineers will soon have the Word for the first time in their own familiar tongue.

—EVANGELIST TILMAN HOBSON has just closed a series of successful meetings in Northern Indiana. He was associated with the Simultaneous Meetings for a part of two seasons under the direction of the General Assembly's Committee on Evangelistic Work.

—ISADOR SPRAKER, a reader of this journal, writes: "Burney, Cassel, Fall River and Hat Creek, Shasta County, Calif., offer a great opportunity for an evangelist or stationed preacher. There is no regular preacher here. The people would support one who would come and work for the common good of all."

—REV. W. E. BIEDERWOLF, the director of the Kansas Forward Movement, is now holding meetings at Clay Center, Northern Kansas. He has a corps of workers, including Charles F. Allen, Homer Rodeheaver, soloist; Ray Y. Cliff and Alexander Asher. Evangelist Tilman Hobson is conducting a meeting at Seneca; H. W. Stough at Norton; French Oliver at Phillipsburg; W. N. Conoley at Hayes, and meetings are progressing in other towns.

ROME'S ATTEMPT TO STORM ENGLAND

Her Programme of Conquest Foiled by Premier Asquith Forbidding the Papal Procession of "the Ho"

Archbishop Bourne

The Monstrance

Which was forbidden to be carried through the streets of London.

THE British people are at this moment, so far as the overwhelming majority are concerned, deeply incensed at the action of the Pope, the Vatican, Cardinal Vannutelli, and Dr. Bourne, Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. The action of Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, and of Mr. Herbert Gladstone, the Home Secretary, in prohibiting the ceremony of carrying the "Elevated Host" in the gorgeous procession through the streets of East London, around the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster, has given mortal offense to thousands of Romanists, and has elicited, on the other hand, enthusiastic expression of approval from multitudes of Protestants.

It was imagined by some superficial minds that the whole incident would in a few days be forgotten; but a most acrimonious controversy is raging in the correspondence of the British daily press, and countless editorials are being written day by day. The British people are more deeply stirred than they have been by any religious question during the last half century.

The Eucharistic Congress at Westminster was designed by Rome to accelerate the materialization of the deeply-cherished idea of the Papal conquest of England, in order to the complete subsequent subjugation of the rest of the world. This aim was in no way concealed. For the first time since the days of Queen Elizabeth, over three centuries ago, a Papal legate has been sent to England, in the person of the famous Cardinal Vannutelli, one of the most extreme leaders of the Ultramontane or Jesuit section of the Italian Catholics. The Pope, in giving his benediction to a party of young men leaving Rome for the Congress, said, "Go and convert England!"

When the Catholic Emancipation Act was passed by the British Parliament, enabling Catholics to become members of Parliament, and granting various other concessions, certain reservations were explicitly defined. In accordance with these, an attempt to carry the "Host" in public has always been well known to be illegal, and when it was announced that such a ceremony was being arranged, a storm of protestation at once broke out in Protestant circles. But the Archbishop persisted in his scheme, and entered on an altercation by letter with the Prime Minister and Home Secretary. Now, Premier Asquith is by profession a skilled lawyer, and he perfectly understood the bearings of the whole matter. Therefore, the Archbishop at length was compelled to yield, and the splendid procession, witnessed by immense multitudes, was shorn of its chief idolatrous accessory. Had this been displayed, undoubtedly a terrible street riot would have ensued.

The plea of the British Protestants in the case is a perfectly valid one, and is only too intelligible. They know that Roman Catholics in Europe persistently claim the full exercise of religious liberty, which they will not allow to others. This is the doctrine clearly laid down in the notorious Papal syllabus of 1884. What chiefly stirs strong Protestant indignation is not merely Roman Catholic doctrine, but modern Ultramontanism. English Protestants have deeply marked the long fight against freedom, intellectual and political, treacherously and insidiously fought by the Jesuits. It is recognized that multitudes of saintly and heavenly-minded Christians are members of the Roman Catholic Church; but for all that, it is the conviction of thoughtful and serious Evangelical Christians that Rome itself never sleeps. The Curia is implacable. And many incidents lamentably prove that toleration for religious opinions is utterly unknown as an element of the Roman Catholic system of ecclesiasticism. This system claims for priest the right to rule in all the affairs of every human being, from the cradle to the grave.

One of the guests at the Eucharistic Congress London was the Bishop of Pernambuco, who recently superintended the burning of Bibles sent to South America from England. The Archbishop of Malta, although that island is an integral portion of the British Empire, demanded of the British government that it should deny to Protestants the right to hold any meetings in the open air. Spain, many Protestant evangelists have during recent years been flagrantly interfered with by the priests in the small towns and villages, and several instances they have been imprisoned for several days by the mayors at the instigation of the priests.

Earnest attempts were made by Protestant workers to reach the souls of visitors to the Congress. Tracts were distributed and conversation were entered into, with the most encouraging results in many cases. An earnest agent of the Women's Protestant Union says: "Two other Roman Catholic women were inclined to tax me with trying to make a disturbance; but in every instance I found that patience, courtesy, and kindly fairness of dealing carried me safe through all difficulties. One of these women admitted what, as I told her, I had never heard a Romanist admit yet—that Rome was both wrong and cruel when she burnt the martyrs. This remark was quite voluntary on her part. I had never mentioned the burning of heretics."

Another of the Women's Protestant Union workers reports that while distributing tracts at Albert Hall, she had a terrible experience, and felt as if she had been transported to the Middle Ages. One priest said, very mockingly and triumphantly: "You do not know God! We are going to carry him through the streets on Sunday!"

"Indeed you are not," she replied. "That is not the living and true God. I do know him, and he has been revealed to me by his Holy Spirit in Jesus Christ."

They were mostly indignant and would not take the Gospel leaflets; but with some, earnest conversation was possible. These were more reasonable though very bigoted.

FIGHTING THE "WHITE PLAGUE"

Outdoor Collapsing Cot, Displayed at the Congress

MPRESSIVE not so much from the exalted and dignified position in the world of science of many of the delegates, or from the thousands in attendance, as for the beneficent purpose for which the gathering had been called, as the opening of the Sixth Triennial International Congress on Tuberculosis. It met in the auditorium of the new National Museum in Washington, and was attended by over four thousand five hundred delegates, not physicians alone, though they were in the majority, but also by men distinguished in other fields of scientific research, diplomats and laymen who are all interested in the attempts that are already being made and in many instances successfully, to stay the ravages of the "Great White Plague," which demands more victims every year from the human race than all other diseases, wars, and famine combined.

Dr. E. LeDetre, Hungary

Madame Carlstrom, Sweden

Secretary Cortelyou, of the Treasury Department, represented President Roosevelt and presided at the opening session. The diplomatic corps, the honorary presidents and the presidents of sections of the Congress which will consider special topics, met in an ante-room and led by Secretary Cortelyou entered the main hall and proceeded in a long procession to the platform. The Marine Band played "Hail to the Spirit of Liberty," as the dignified body of men arranged themselves back of the chairman's desk. The four honorary presidents were loudly cheered by the assembly when their names were announced—names of men who are known the world over for their unselfish efforts in behalf of suffering humanity. They were Dr. Robert Koch, of Berlin, who discovered the tuberculosis bacillus over thirty years ago; Dr. Louis Landouzy, of France; Dr. E. L. Trudeau, of Saranac Lake, N. Y., and Dr. Theodore Williams, of London.

The hall in which the Congress met was fringed about with bunting, and festoons of foreign flags were gathered at the pillars. Here and there the bright dresses of women delegates (for the women are taking an active part in the sessions) added a bright touch of color to the scene. One of the ladies from Sweden wore her national costume at the meetings, but the rest, whatever their nationality, showed how strong is the influence of Paris and Berlin in other things than scientific research.

Secretary Cortelyou in his speech of welcome traced the growth of concerted action against tuberculosis and brought out many facts concerning the startling amount of human life sacrificed every year to the disease. The part taken by the National government against the disease greatly interested the foreign delegates.

"The government," said Mr. Cortelyou, "has prescribed certain rules to prevent the spread of the disease among its employees, and has also established government sanitarium. In 1899 the United States Public Health Service established the Marine Hospital Sanitarium at Fort Stanton, New Mexico, a government reservation of forty-five square miles, with an altitude of 6,231 feet. This accommodates an average of two hundred seamen of the merchant marine. The War Department maintains a sanitarium at Fort Bayard, New Mexico, and the Navy Department a sanitarium in Colorado. Congress has provided for a hospital in the District of Columbia for indigent persons. The Fifty-ninth Congress during its first session made provision for an investigation as to the prevalence of tuberculosis among the Indians." The Secretary said that the bubonic plague in India had not caused so many deaths as tuberculosis in the United States in an equal period of time, and that the statistics showed that in the last four years three times as many people died of tuberculosis in this country as were killed in action or died as the result of wounds during the entire four years of the American Civil War.

Various famous physicians made short addresses, and when the form of Dr. Robert Koch, of Berlin, was seen making its way to the front of the platform, the enthusiasm of the delegates knew no bounds. The applause was deafening and came in a great muffled roar to people outside the building. Dr. Koch had been taking a hurried trip through Canada. He got there just in time to see the extent of the great forest fire. He traveled, he reports, in a cloud of smoke from Vancouver to Montreal. There he was compelled to cancel his engagements, as the smoke affected his throat, and he came on hurriedly to Washington, to strike a clearer atmosphere. When he spoke at the Congress, however, his voice had its usual clearness. He seemed greatly pleased at the welcome accorded him.

One of the interesting incidents of the Congress was a speech delivered in excellent English by Dr. Jee, the representative of China. He is now a student of medicine at Yale, and Minister Wu Ting Fang, gorgeous in his state robes, sat in a front row to hear Dr. Jee's address. Japan is also represented, showing the stride the East has made in medical science.

The real work of the Congress was accomplished in the meetings of sections, where the physicians could give their experience in more detail. One paper was read by Dr. Barber, who advocated a system of immunizing people by inoculating them with the living germ, much as a patient is vaccinated to prevent small-pox. A large number of the physicians consider this as altogether too radical, but it was considered as opening up a new field of study for the physician.

The subject of tuberculosis in cows and the danger of people contracting tuberculosis from milk was the subject of lengthy debate. In fact, two distinct views are held as to whether the present infective test is decisive. Dr. Raw, of London, said that "the bacillus of tuberculosis must be present in milk before it is capable of producing tuberculosis."

Dr. J. S. Fulton, Sec. of the Congress

Dr. Eduardo Liceaya, Mexico

In the educational exhibit held in connection with the Congress is a model dairy, showing a building constructed after hygienic plans for the shelter of the herd and the proper appliances to keep the milk from being contaminated. There were various devices shown for protecting the body while the patient is sleeping out of doors, that plays such a prominent part in the present treatment of the disease. The collapsable cot with a little canvas tent over it was considered one of the successful solutions of the problem. Fresh air, winter and summer, with proper diet, is saving many.

Seeking for Light

TO SEE old age passing amid spiritual darkness, when it might be radiant with brightness and hope, is a spectacle to awaken both sadness and pity. This is the picture suggested by a very remarkable letter recently published in the New York Sun, in which Professor Goldwin Smith, the famous agnostic, reviews the results of his lifelong search after truth and records his failure. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" asked Zophar the Naamathite. "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" The aged professor has tried to do this. He has apparently tested all the modern creeds, has found it impossible to reconcile them, and has abandoned the attempt. His long life seems to be closing in hopeless gloom.

Professor Smith has run through the complete gamut of intellectual inquiry. He has found the old Bible seemingly full of flaws and inconsistencies, and has expended all the resources of his scholarship in studying the complicated question of authorship and authenticity. With the inevitable futility of science when applied to spiritual inquiry, he has tried to reduce infinity to a mathematical demonstration. Putting reason in the seat of faith, he has excluded all evidence that did not appeal to intellectuality. He confesses with sincere sorrow that he found the problems of deity, creation, man's destiny, and the conflict of good with evil, unsolvable. Immortality he pronounces incomprehensible. "We cannot appeal from reason to faith," he writes; "there must be reason." Yet, amid all his disappointments arising from his scientific search for God and truth, and notwithstanding the fact that he regards all religious dogma as "merely human," he finds in the Christian ideal of character the one thing that may continue to unite Christendom. In it, he admits, "we have a rule of life." Though he holds immortality to be imagination, he finds in man a "natural belief" in deity. If the great agnostic, who is so frank in admitting his failures, could have grasped the fact that faith is the only bridge that can span the dark abyss, how different would have been the result!

Lord Kelvin, one of the most distinguished scientists of the age, who passed away last winter, was, like Professor Goldwin Smith, a seeker after light. But he had found the great secret—faith. "I find science full of the evidence of God," he wrote, "and no reading of theological books is necessary to keep me contented with the Christian religion of my childhood."

There are a thousand things in our daily lives—in nature and in science, and many palpable things in ourselves—that we cannot comprehend. How, then, can we divine the mind of the great Creator? He has given us a revelation by which, if we accept it in simple faith, as Lord Kelvin did and as many other leaders among men have done, we can grow to further comprehension. It is only by faith, and faith alone, as simple and trustful as that of a little child, that we, who are but as children in a spiritual sense, can realize our relation to God, and our duty to him and to our fellow-men. Paul told the inquiring Corinthians that "a veil lay upon their hearts" because of a lack of faith, and that it would be taken away when they turned to God, and accepted his revelation of truth and reconciliation through Jesus Christ. So it is with our learned inquirers to-day. Until they realize that infinity is beyond the horizon of mere finite search, and that to find the spiritual kingdom of life and immortality which Christ brought to light, they must become as little children, they will continue to search in vain.

Flood and Pestilence in Asia

WHILE it is true that we in this country suffer occasionally from floods, forest fires and similar visitations, we may well consider our own recent experience at least as insignificant, when we read of the frightful calamities that are occurring in some other parts of the globe. India, baked by drought so long that another famine was threatened, has now been visited by rains so heavy that lakes and rivers have burst their banks. A great territorial area in Hyderabad and Deccan was flooded, and 10,000 persons, chiefly women and helpless children, were drowned. One unfortunate village was literally swallowed up by the flood, and so covered with black mud that its thousand houses had disappeared. Pestilence, which usually follows in the wake of such disasters, is now apprehended. China, too, contributes its share to the grim story of suffering. Bubonic plague has broken out near Tientsin; but what is far more terrible and significant is the news that cholera has carried off 30,000 victims in Hankow Province this season, including a number of foreigners. It has been raging unchecked throughout the whole Yangtse Valley. Investigation will very likely disclose the fact that the cholera has spread from Chinese seaports to other parts of Asia and the Philippines, and possibly that the Russian visitation also is traceable to the same source.

An Example of Stewardship

FOR many years THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has advocated the principle in its pages that men and women of wealth are for the most part stewards of the property that has been entrusted to them, and that the more this is realized by them the less would be the friction between the social classes of our population. More and more our men of wealth and leaders of industry are taking a practical interest in public institutions and philanthropic enterprises and are showing that their stewardship is one to which they or their families may point with pride. A great deal of this giving for the public good has been done unostentatiously, and the names of some great philanthropists have only been made known to the public at their death.

A few weeks ago there died at Owego, N. Y., Frederick Cooper Hewitt, a man of distinguished family, but who lived quietly, a lover of art, literature and good works. He left a fortune of seven millions, and as his relatives were wealthy, he left all but one hundred thousand of this vast sum for the benefit of his fellow men. He gave his famous collection of pictures to a museum and a large sum for the promotion of art in America; over two millions were left to a New York hospital, a hospital whose authorities did not know the donor's name and were unaware that he had ever been there even as a visitor; school orphanages, homes of various kinds were remembered in the long list of benefactions through which Mr. Hewitt will be a power for good long after the close of his earthly career.

The same day on which those princely gifts were announced it was learned that a gentleman in New York had given ten millions to further the cause of technical education. Such things go far toward settling many of our present-day social and economic problems and are examples that will undoubtedly be followed with increasing frequency by others.

Switzerland's Temperance Victory

LITTLE Switzerland has set the whole world an example in the triumphant and public-spirited way in which it has dealt with the evil of intemperance. For many years past, the use of absinthe had been increasing in several of the Swiss Cantons, producing crime and physical and moral deterioration. This was especially the case in the Cantons of Vaud, Geneva and Neuchatel. About 1,000,000 litres of the poisonous alcoholic drink were consumed annually, over one-half being sold and drunk in Geneva.

Now, in Switzerland, the twenty-two Cantons have a patriotic motto which reads "One for all and all for one." The sensible and order-loving Swiss felt that the grave danger which threatened those three Cantons should be made a national question. Accordingly, a movement was begun to have prohibitive laws enacted. This was first accomplished in the Canton of Vaud in 1906, after a most exciting campaign, during which 83,000 persons signed a petition to the legislature. In the Canton of Geneva a similar petition received 35,000 signatures, and a prohibitive law was passed a year ago. Neuchatel Canton, the centre of the great absinthe industry, was the next battle ground. Here the foe was so entrenched that a cantonal law was out of the question. A Federal Committee was appointed and petition circulated demanding that the sale and manufacture of absinthe be prohibited throughout the entire Confederation and that this should be passed upon by the Swiss nation by means of a referendum or popular vote. This received 168,000 signatures, while only 50,000 were needed to bring about the "initiative vote."

So strong was the influence of the liquor interest that the whole scheme was in danger of defeat. How it finally triumphed is told in these words by Mr. J. H. Abegg, of Goldbach, a well-informed and influential Swiss:

The Federal Chambers (Congress), however, consisting of the Upper and the Lower House, after a memorable session and largely owing to epoch-making speeches by such men as Gustave Ador of Geneva, Secretary of Vaud, the philosopher and moralist, Professor Hilty and others, decided to allow the referendum. Then followed throughout Switzerland a stirring campaign, by means of which the dangers of the absinthe habit were clearly set before the entire country. And when, on July of this year, the vote was cast throughout the land, it was found, to the joy of all lovers of their country and its highest interests and prosperity, that the proposals of the "initiators" were accepted by 241,078 ayes to 138,669 nays—a majority of 102,409.

The German Cantons—let it be said to their honor—voted for reasons purely fraternal and patriotic, not to say ethical, to help their fellow citizens of French Switzerland.

The new law goes into effect January 1, 1910. One notable result of the Swiss victory for temperance has been the starting of a similar anti-absinthe movement in France, where the vice of absinthe drinking has become a national scourge.

Sunday School Conversions

RESPONDING to our recent invitation, a number of Sunday School superintendents in different States have written to this journal, forwarding statements of the proportion of conversions in their schools during the past year. These letters appear on another page. In every instance, the ratio is much greater than that indicated for the Sunday Schools of this country generally by the authority we recently quoted. It will be remembered that the authority in question, basing his calculations upon the reports prescribed at the last Sunday School National Convention, announced the startling conclusion that more than one-half the Sunday School scholars of this country, a great host of over 7,000,000 souls, "go down to death unsaved."

Those Sunday School superintendents already heard from give figures that are very far from substantiating this remarkable charge. Indeed, if they are to be accepted as a fair index of the whole, the inevitable conclusion is that the Sunday Schools are doing their duty faithfully and efficiently, and that a very much larger proportion of the scholars are brought to accept Christ and to unite with the church, than has been represented.

We cordially repeat the invitation to the superintendents to send us the facts, briefly stating the proportion of annual conversions among their scholars and the numbers who unite with the church.

THE WOMEN'S CONGRESS IN SESSION AT GENEVA, SWITZERLAND

International Women's Congress

THE Congress of the International Council of Women was held in Geneva during the month of September. It was opened by Lady Aberdeen, Acting President of the Congress. The delegates included representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, the United States, Australia, the Argentine, and the chief Continental nations. We live in an era of conventions for men and for women. Women's gatherings are found everywhere, from the committee meeting of the church or lodge, to township, county, State and national conventions of all kinds, which consider the questions that affect the material, mental and moral welfare of the people. This international parliament was composed of the most conspicuous representatives of the different countries, and devoted its attention especially to the health and broader education of the people. Among heathen nations, woman has generally been counted man's slave, or beast of burden. It is only where God's will has been revealed that she has been allowed to take her proper place in the doings and destiny of the world. No women of olden time were so honored as were those of the Hebrews; but Christ taught the church and the world woman's real place in society. He broke the shackles of her slavery and gave her freedom from the exalted tasks and divine liberties of his children. Our Christian civilization has recognized the tremendous influence of women in the home and church and State, and the actions of the congresses—local, national and international—will be looked to with the deepest public interest.

She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. (Prov. 31 : 26.)

Was Too Late

A score of years ago the Hornikel family lived happily in a little village near Berlin. Their son, a boy in his teens, tiring of the monotonous life of the country, came to America and obtained employment as a jeweler in Chicago. He continued to write home to his parents for two years, and then he ceased his correspondence. The father died and the mother, in sorrow and loneliness, tried to learn of her son's whereabouts. Failing to discover him, she made her home with a married daughter. Every week she wrote a letter to her boy, sending it to the old address, trusting that some way or other it might follow and reach him. A few months ago she suffered a paralytic stroke, which it was thought would prove fatal, but the passion of her life was to find the boy, and so she sailed for New York to make the search. Being too weak to travel to Chicago she stopped at Newark, N. J. There she put an advertisement in the War Cry, mentioning the name of her boy and asking him to come home, saying, "We miss you." A letter came from her son Emil in New Orleans, who had now grown to be a man in middle life, asking the editor of the War Cry where his mother could be found. The answer was sent with the mother's address and with this message from her: "Hasten, my boy. I am dying." He started on the first train, but had only gotten a little distance when this telegram met him: "Your mother is dead; we found you just too late." The man was full of remorse and deep regret at his long silence and the pain he had brought to his mother's heart. There are so many kind words we could speak, so many loving acts we could perform, that are withheld until it is too late; there are so many determinations to abandon an evil habit, to lay out courses of beneficent action; so many intentions to cease the wanderings from home and come back to the heart of the Infinite Father who yearns for the return of his child, which are delayed until it is too late! It is a sad thing not to reach a mother's side who really is dying with loneliness for the return of her boy; but it is a much more serious thing to be too late in reaching the heart of Christ and heaven, the home of the soul.

And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut. (Matt. 25 : 10.)

Penalty of Cheating

A midshipman at Annapolis from Minnesota, a member of the second class at the United States Naval Academy, has been allowed to resign because of improper conduct at the recent competition at Camp Perry, Ohio. This young man raised his own record for target work and his score was so high that he had been recommended for a sharp-shooter's medal. The medal was about to be issued when Captain Charles J. Badger, Superintendent of the Naval Academy, discovered that the midshipman's high rank in the contest had been secured by fraud. The successful contestant admitted that he had raised the score higher than it should have been, in order to obtain a place on the Navy Rifle Team. As his previous record had been good, he was allowed to resign from the navy instead of being discharged in disgrace as he otherwise would have been.

What a sad thing for a young man of ability and high ambition to make such a mistake! No matter how penitent he may be or determined to live an honest life, he will be a long time repairing the damage he has done himself. In the competitions of life for its favors and rewards, too large a number are willing to steal or lie or cheat to secure their own benefit or promotion. It speaks well for the United States government that so high a standard of morals is required. In numerous instances vice seems to have its rewards in matters of money and official promotion, but in the long run it is the man that plays fair as well as shoots straight that secures the rewards rather than suffers the penalties in the contests of this world.

Ye shall not steal, neither lie one to another. (Lev. 19 : 11.)

The Beaded Moccasins and War

The Indian war between the Pelly River and Blind Creek tribes, which threatened such disaster, has just been settled by the swift and brave action of Captain Fitzhorrigan. The trouble between the tribes was traceable directly to the imprudence of the young wife of a member of the Blind Creek tribe. Her husband, Jonathan, a member of the Blind Creeks and brother to the chief, had been socially ostracized because he was a thief. His wife, tired of this social ban, received the attention of Liard Bob, a Pelly River Indian. She gave him an elaborately embroidered and beaded pair of moccasins. Jonathan, hearing of it, was furious and tried to kill the popular Bob. They fought with knives and fists until Bob, slipping Jonathan, obtained his knife and had him at his mercy. Then Jonathan seized a shotgun and fired at his prostrate rival. Bob reached for Jonathan's rifle, and shot him dead with his own weapon, whereupon Chief Ijuth of the Blind Creeks, brother of the murdered man, at once swore blood vengeance and gathered about him a thousand Indians to take the warpath. Word of the impending conflict was carried to Dawson by two trappers, Poole and Field. Captain Fitzhorrigan at once chartered a steamer and went to the camp of the chief, where he found two thousand Indians ready for war, while the members of the other tribe were getting ready also for a contest which had in it possible tribal extermination. The British officer, by his expedition, tact and excellent spirit, brought the hostile forces together in a manner which secured permanent peace. Since the days of Homer the stealing of a woman has been the occasion of the fiercest wars; social intrigues have opened fountains of blood on many a battlefield. Conjugal fidelity is the only basis of individual happiness or national prosperity and peace.

Let everyone so love his wife even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband. (Eph. 5 : 33.)

Dogs Hanged for Crime

An Eskimo boy, six years of age, was playing with some sleigh-dogs at Sandwich Bay, Labrador, when his foot tripped and he fell to the ground. Two of the dogs, like so many sleigh-dogs of the North, seeing their opportunity, pounced upon him and killed him while he was down. The father of the child went to Cartwright, the missionary who owned the dogs, and demanded that the animals should be hanged as a penalty for their crime; and so, to pacify him, the dogs were condemned to death and formally hanged.

Animals, though having no conscience, are often punished for their wrong-doing. The sheep-stealing dog was marked for death, and the one that bit a child or an adult was only permitted to live by the toleration of the community. These Eskimo dogs knew no better than to pounce upon the boy and kill him; but there are human beasts who know better, that kill men, women and children, and it is one of the mistakes of our times that penalties for crime, and especially for murder, are so inadequately visited upon the wrong-doers by our courts of justice, and that encouragement, rather than discouragement, is often given to the malefactor.

Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. (Eccles. 8 : 11.)

Sold His Blood

A tramp who came from Baltimore to New York, stealing his way in the corner of a freight car, sold eighteen ounces of his blood for ten dollars in cash to the authorities at the Presbyterian Hospital, to save a rich patient from death. He was told optimistically by the surgical staff that perhaps in four days after the vital fluid had been extracted he would be able to walk and return to his lodgings in the Mills Hotel. For over an hour the young man lay on his back on the operating table; he then arose, unassisted, and, ignoring the protests of the doctors, walked out of the hospital. He did not stagger, his eyes were clear, and the only evidence that he had risked his life for ten dollars to save that of a person he did not know, was a bandage wound tightly about his left arm, where the incision had been made. He spent the rest of the day, from half-past two in the afternoon until eleven o'clock, visiting friends, when he returned to his lodging-place. The saving of life by a transfusion of blood has gotten to be a practically scientific demonstration. The purchase of the best things, including life, with blood, has been a law of the world. There was One who did not sell his blood for silver or gold, but who gave it freely that the children of men might have life.

Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life. (John 6 : 54.)

CRUISER "YANKEE" IN PERIL

AT SUNRISE on the morning of September 23, while a dense fog obscured the Massachusetts coast, the United States cruiser Yankee struck on the jagged rocks known as the Hen and Chickens in Buzzard's Bay. It is said that the cruiser was quite a little off her course, due to the weather conditions. Her commander, Charles C. Marsh, was on deck when the crash and jar told him the Yankee had struck. He at once signaled the engine room to have the engines reversed to back the Yankee off the ledge. But the propellers whirled in vain. The ship was hard and fast.

The officers hurriedly examined her hull, and found that it had been cut through, and that the water was pouring in rapidly. One compartment was already filled with water. Messages were sent ashore and four tugs and a collier were there in a few hours to render assistance. A second examination of the hull showed several small holes in the bottom and one great cut about eight feet above the keel, and there were several large holes on the port side, where the sharp rocks had bitten through. It was found that the cruiser could not be got off unless a bulwark was built about her like a coffer dam, and the water pumped out.

For nearly a week various schemes were tried, more water getting into the hold, and her situation getting rapidly worse. Several times the wind rose and drove the water in heavy surges against the helpless cruiser, shaking her on her rocky bed, ripping her plates and sending new floods of water into her compartments. During one storm it was feared she would be scuttled. A corps of naval appraisers from the training station at New R. I., were placed on board to help pair her from the inside. They were compelled to leave the vessel, however, as the fireroom became flooded, and the fires under the boilers were out. It was at once surmised that other large hole had been poured through the bottom by the racking ship received during the heavy sea. Rear-Admiral Capps said there was a good chance of saving the Yankee if they could build a coffer dam in the front compartment, and there were no storms for eight or ten days. The ship could then be pumped out and towed to Boston. The ship has her full length perched upon the rocks at present, and her guns and coal have been taken from her.

The coast from Buzzard's around Cape Cod to Boston has been a graveyard for ships ever since the days of the first explorers. Rocks and bars extend hundreds of feet from shore and make it dangerous water sail in except in the best of weather. The records of ships lost on the length of coast show that many hundreds have already left their homes there to the mercy of the elements.

Superintendents on Sunday School Conversions

IN A RECENT issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD called attention to the surprising statement, emanating from a supposed authority on Sunday School work, that "over half of our Sunday School scholars are untouched by the Gospel invitation; that 11,000,000 children out of a total of 14,000,000 pass out of the school unconverted during a period of eight years, and that even conceding many conversions after the Sunday School age, it would still be true that a great host of over 7,000,000 souls go down to death unsaved."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invited the views of Sunday School superintendents on this subject. We give below some of the replies received:

The Old and New Systems Contrasted

In my earlier days in Sunday School and church work we had but few so-called "helps." Our text-books were the Bible and little Testaments brought generally from the homes of the scholars and teachers. All became acquainted with the Scriptures at first hand and the teaching was expository and spiritual. Scholars would memorize many verses of Scripture to be rehearsed and would often commit to memory entire chapters. Thus the memory was educated and a store of divine knowledge acquired, to be drawn on in the coming years.

Since the introduction of the International Sunday School literature and so-called "Lesson-Plans," the churches have been pestered with a class of so-called "great Sunday School workers" whose main endowments were a superficial portable kind of religion, hence the scholars become what their teachers and teachings are.

Humansville, Mo. W. H. WEST.

Fifty per Cent. of His Scholars Converted

I have been superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church Sunday School for ten years, and I think I can safely say that fifty per cent. of our children have been converted, and are leading consistent Christian lives. The other fifty per cent. are living good and moral lives. Of this latter number twenty-five per cent. are converted and added to the church. By the help of the Lord we hope to see the balance become consecrated Christians, and as these grow up and pass out, we hope to see the children yet to be born falling in line.

Dahlonega, Ga. G. MCGUIRE.

The Sunday School the Church's Feeder

From our school, during the year ending March 31, 1908, eighteen persons united with the church. All of these were under twenty years of age. I believe the Sabbath School is doing a greater work to-day than any other institution outside of the home, to mould character and to make of our boys and girls good, honest, God-fearing, country-loving men and women. All honor to the thousands of noble men and women who, unknown, unthanked and unpaid, are doing this great work for God and country.

Sewickley, Pa.

Another Spiritually Live Sunday School

We have had thirteen (13) conversions in our school (enrollment 50) already this year.

All of these are young people and have joined the church and are doing a great work for the Lord. I believe these have come through the direct work of their teachers and home influence. My teachers are all consecrated Christians, members of the church, and zealous workers, which is absolutely necessary to soul-saving work.

If the figures in the article you quote are true, they show that there is too much "buying" scholars into the Sunday Schools by gift schemes, pins, reward tickets, etc., and too many teachers who are not consecrated Christians. Consequently the spiritual part of the work is lowered and left undone.

Superintendent Baptist Sunday School,
Wildwood, Fla.

A Large Proportion of Converts

I submit the following from our church records: Our church has received for baptism, upon profession of saving faith in Jesus, since June, 1901, a total of 89, of which 71 were Sunday School scholars, between 12 and 21 years old. Some of our scholars have joined other Baptist churches near by. Within the past thirteen months our church has received 26 for baptism upon profession, of which 20 were Sunday School scholars. Our church is a small country church, with preaching one Sunday only each month.

Thinks the Criticisms Too Sweeping

My conviction and observation are that there is a great deal of truth in the strictures on the Sunday School by the clergyman you refer to, and it is due in large measure to the fact that so many Sunday School teachers are not trained teachers, and above all to the fact that they are not filled sufficiently with the spirit of Christ, and are not therefore enough interested in the work to do it well. The majority of our Sunday School teachers do not get close enough to their pupils to feel perfectly free and easy with them in presenting Christ for their consideration. We need more teachers who have received Christ into their own hearts and lives, and who are glad to present him to others, especially to their Sunday School pupils. We have this same difficulty to contend with in our Sunday Schools here (the Methodist Episcopal South).

This past summer, however, we had a fine revival meeting, in which we received twenty-eight new members into the church from the Sunday School, and this out of a total of forty-one new members, some of whom came in, however, by letter. This meeting was very gratifying to me as superintendent of our school, for it has given me talking material from my own experiences in favor of the Sunday School as the recruiting ground of the Church, and I think will enable us to improve things considerably.

I trust that you will find that the clergyman in question is wrong in the sweeping conclusions he draws, and I believe he is; but I feel sure that there is by far too much truth in his strictures.

Supt. Methodist (South) S. S.
Minden, La.

Conclusion Wrong, Says Superintendent

Our Sunday School has an enrollment of about 300, and an average attendance of about 225. We took into the church from the Sunday School 25 young people—boys and girls. I think they were all under fifteen years. At that time there were not more than eight or ten over eight years old who were not members of some church.

I think the authority you quote draws wrong conclusions from his figures. Surely a large number of the Sunday School people of to-day are above the age limit of fourteen years. In our school over one-half are more than fourteen years old.

C. A. BARRETT,
Supt. M. E. S. S.
Edmond, Okla.

A Pennsylvania School's Good Record

I am a superintendent of a small Sunday School, about four miles from my home, in a neglected place. I can unhesitatingly say that its spiritual condition is deepening and extending throughout the community. While we have an average attendance of only fifteen scholars, we have had three professed conversions during the past six months in our little prayer meetings that directly follow our Sunday School hour of study.

I think the trouble with the statistics is that the question is asked in the annual report: "How many from your school have united with the church during the last year?" At this point, we have no church for them to unite with; but each of the three mentioned is striving to live a better life and will doubtless unite with the church sometime. And were it not for the Sunday School, these people would have no means of grace or Gospel privileges.

Powell, Pa. PERRY BROWN.

A High Percentage of Conversions

I will give you a report of my Sunday School during the last six years. In my first year we had 48 attendance; second year, 51; third year, 57; fourth year, 46; fifth year, 59; sixth year, 68; total conversions during the six years 61. Nearly all were children taught in the Sunday School. I cannot help saying, "Praise the Lord for the Sunday School!"

Pretty Prairie, Kan. D. P. DORPES.

Twenty Per Cent. Converts in a Year

We have had about twenty conversions in our Sunday School in the last twelve months. We have only a small school—one hundred enrolled, with seventy-five average attendance. Our school is in pretty good working order.

From a Texas Superintendent

I have been—with short interruption—superintendent for a country Sunday School in Frio County, Texas, for eighteen years. We are working in the ranks of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Southwest Conference, San Antonio District. The children of the neighborhood, especially of the Methodist congregation, have grown up under my observation and special care as superintendent.

In regard to figures not lying, I will say they are deceitful in such matters. In the last two years out of a Sunday School of about twenty children (average attendance by record), we had eleven join the church, the remainder being too young to understand the significance of such an act. Thus they come and go from year to year. The real effect of the continuous, faithful Sunday School work, not in figures, but in fact, is that the former children, now grown up and having little children themselves, have built in this comparatively poor community in a droughty climate a $1,000 church building and are not sending, but leading, their little ones to Sunday School and the Saviour.

F. CLAUSEWITZ,
Superintendent,
Pearsall, Tex.

The Sunday School Outlook

For the information of all who are interested in the present controversy we give the following statement of the Sunday School situation by Marion Lawrence, General Secretary of the International Interdenominational Sunday School Association:

The total Sunday School enrollment of North America is nearly one million larger than was three years ago. To-day the grand total of scholars on this continent is 20,000,000, a teachers 1,500,000. In the past triennium excess of 900,000 additions have come to church membership through the Sunday School. About fourteen new Sunday Schools a day have been organized since 1905, enrolling a total 15,000, and more for the past three years.

The financial support of the International Association has increased from $56,000, which was received from 1902 to 1905, to $106,000 which was received from 1905 to 1908. This amount has made it possible to employ one hundred and sixteen special secretaries at departmental experts in the work of the Association, and fifty-six others are giving part of their time to Sunday School organization throughout our country and the Provinces of Canada. The Cradle Roll enrollment has reached the enormous figure in the past triennium of 444,000, representing a gain of over hundred per cent.

The whole world is a-tingle with Sunday School enthusiasm and interest. To-day the Sunday School occupies a more favorable place in the world's thought than ever before. This is our day of opportunity. Phenomenal growth in Sunday School organization is reported from Mexico, from the West Indies, from Japan, Korea, from the great northwestern Canada Provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, from the Central West and the Far West of our own country.

A Delighted Subscriber

Dear Dr. Klopsch: After having read in the Red Letter Bible, which you so generously gave as a premium through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have come to the conclusion that haven't half expressed my appreciation of this great Book, and your whole-souled generosity.

It has been a great comfort to me in my loneliness to read it. May God help me to give it the attention it deserves, and not only that, but to live up to its teachings.

OCTOBER DAYS

By Margaret E. Sangster

On Losing Friends

AM not about to write of the loss of our friends by death. Friends who leave us for the world beyond are often as near us then as while they lingered here. We are often separated from them by absence and distance, so that the years glide by without our having opportunities to meet, and meanwhile youth gives place to age and the friendship exists only in name. A ballad called "Cousin Anne and Cousin Jane" set forth this situation vividly, and, though I read it a long time ago, I have never forgotten its story. Two little girls lived, one in Boston town and one down in Maine. They were cousins and they corresponded. They had been promised the pleasure of a visit, each to the other, when they were children, but it was not then convenient for their elders to give them the indulgence, and so it was put off until they should be young women. After that there were still insuperable obstacles in the line of such a visit, and Cousin Anne and Cousin Jane did not meet. When both married, and presently settled into the numerous cares of their respective households. When at last the wish of a lifetime was carried out, Cousin Anne and Cousin Jane were quite-haired grandmothers in their seventies. I doubt whether they would have been much farther apart crossing the meridian of their lives had one been in heaven and one on earth.

We do not lose our friends when they cease to be with us in this place of service. They have only gone to another sphere, and often they may be closer to us than we imagine. Longfellow has said, "There is no death; that seems so is transition." Chittier in a beautiful lyric writes that

Death is but a covered way
That leadeth unto light,
Herein no blinded child can stray
Beyond the Father's sight.

Gerald Massey sings:

In this dim world of clouding cares,
We rarely know, till wildered eyes
See white wings lessening up
The skies,
The angels with us unawares.

My point is, if I can but make it clear, that those whom we call dead are more alive than we, and that we do not lose our dear ones when they are for a while out of our sight. We lose our friends while they are still with us, in mournful ways, in needless ways, by mistakes and misunderstandings and by wilful neglect. Sometimes we outgrow them. We started together and we seemed to have the same chance, but our life path was not unlike that of the men who set out in motor cars many months ago racing from New York across the continent, seeking through snow and ice, heat and drought, perils of every description in unknown lands, to reach their ultimate goal in the French capital. Life for some of us is about as hard and rough and full of peril and adventure as for the men who engineered those daring motor cars. Life for others is almost all on flowery beds of ease. It is quite as impossible for friends who are developed through a term of years by antagonistic experiences, to remain entirely the same in heart. We are said to change our identity physically at least every seven years. Our soul identity suffers change also, and friends outgrow one another. This is best illustrated in youth. Two little girls or two lads who are very intimate when they play together and attend the same school, grow apart when in adolescence one goes to college or abroad, and the other is early pushed into business, or stays at home in the same environment. This losing of friends belongs to the common task and the daily round, and is not a thing over which to waste sentiment. A sadder way of losing friends is when through envy, jealousy, or any of the meaner motives that underlie life, two who have been congenial and have been mutually helpful are sundered.

It is the little rift within the lute
That by and by will make the music mute.

We lose our friends oftenest, perhaps, through plain laziness. We are like Martha, cumbered with service. We are busy in the household, busy with the children; worried, it may be, over the income; tired when night comes with the toil of the day. We ought to have dressed in the afternoon and gone out to make calls, but we could not get up the necessary courage, and so we deferred this agreeable duty until a more convenient season. There is a friend of whom you and I can think, who lives only at an hour's distance and to whom we owe a visit, but four seasons have slipped by, from snow-flakes to lilies, from bird-songs to silence, and the visit has not been paid. Once we were ready to make it, but we thought we would wait for a new gown or a new pair of shoes. Again our plans were all completed, and the ceiling fell, and that necessitated a period of strenuous housekeeping. Which of us has not had the experience of suddenly realizing that a year or two or three may be stretching between the time when we last saw a friend to whom a short journey by rail or steamer would easily have carried us? This is all wrong, and it is a wretched way of losing friends.

If we want to keep our friends, we must be hospitable to them in thought, receive them in our homes, visit them from time to time, write to them and answer their letters. Our friends should be in every station, of every age, in every part of our country and the globe. Life narrows perceptibly when we have few friendships and few interests. "A man that hath friends must show himself friendly." Our Lord gave us a blessed assurance when he said, "I have called you friends."

Small Attentions

Cousin Betty came home from her visit to the Landers simply brimming over with new ideas. It was a way she had, this of gathering up hints and suggestions from people she met and harvesting them for future use! The day after her return she glanced over the garden brilliant with autumnal bloom, and over the grape arbor fragrant with its burden of purple fruit. "We never in the world can use all those grapes," she said to Marie, who was lady of the manor, "and don't you think it would be a good plan to let Harold carry some of them to old Mrs. Minturn? She has been an invalid so long that she doesn't have little attentions paid her of the kind that invalids enjoy. While Harold is on the road he may as well take a bunch of sweet peas and a handful of cosmos to Margaret Archer." "Of course," replied Marie. "But, Betty, what has put you in the notion of sending flowers and fruit to those good neighbors? I feel a little self-reproach that I did not do something of the kind without waiting until you advised me to."

"Don't give me the credit," answered Cousin Betty. "I have been spending a fortnight with the Landers. I never have been more impressed anywhere than while in that lovely home, with the persistent stream of good will that flows from it in every direction. If the Landers cannot go to drive, the horses do not stand in the stall, nor is the coachman sent out to exercise them until an invitation has been given to some one who would find a drive a refreshment and pleasure. Marion must keep a list, I fancy, of friends who are ill, or a bit under the weather, for jellies and delicacies, broth, salad, preserves, anything that will tempt a fastidious appetite are unobtrusively sent to somebody nearly every day. As for flowers, the Landers' garden is as much for the pleasure of their friends as for their own gratification. They furnish the flowers for the pulpit every Sunday, and when the children are going to school it is no uncommon thing to see them stop and ask for a rose or a pink with a geranium leaf to carry to their teachers." "What a lot of trouble the Landers must take!" said Marie. "Not so much trouble as thought," was Betty's answer.

These small attentions cost little, but they give no end of delight. They are like the cup of cold water to which is promised the blessing of the Saviour's "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of these little ones, ye did it unto me." There is a whole volume of meaning in that word cold, when one remembers that in Eastern lands, with the tropic warmth and torrid sunshine, it was not easy to give any one a cup of ice-cold water. It would have to be drawn from the depth of the well. The small attentions that tax no one's mind, that make no show, that call for no overpowering gratitude, seem to me to belong in the catalogue of our Christian duty.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—VISITING CARDS. A lady's visiting card must be perfectly plain. If married it must bear her husband's name, as Mrs. John Saunders, not Mrs. Emily Saunders. A widow uses either form. A first call should be returned within a fortnight. It is not necessary to leave cards when one calls frequently on intimate friends.

Questions and Answers

H. B. Hattiesburg, Miss. What is the meaning of Satan's Disobedience (by Carlyle)? Why was the name applied to the book? Is there any allusion in this title to history or mythology?

It means the "Tailor Retained." It was the fancy of the author to discuss clothes and their social and intellectual significance. The book has no reference to mythology. It was described by Emerson as "a criticism upon the spirit of the age, exhibiting in a just and novel light the present aspects of religion, politics, literature, art and social life."

H. B. B., Bellefonte, Mo. Do you think it probable that navigation of the air will eventually be solved and aerial transportation realized within a few years?

While recent experiments with the aeroplane have given much encouragement, scientists will hardly declare on that account that the problem of aerial navigation has actually been solved. A few more years may decide it, however. Aerial transportation lines are probably a long way off yet, notwithstanding the sanguine predictions of some enthusiastic publications.

G. W. C., Albany, N. Y. Not judging nor criticising, but in a spirit of sincere, earnest inquiry, I would ask your opinion as to whether the lives of Christians to-day, as a rule, conform to the plain requirement in Luke 14: 33?

This does not mean, as some imagine, that Christ's followers are required, as an essential qualification, to give up means, position and influence; but it should be rather interpreted in the light of Paul's illustration of the Christian athlete (see Heb. 12: 1). We are to utilize all the advantages at hand for God's glory and our own spiritual development and that of others, and to sacrifice every inconvincence. Whether Christians to-day, as a whole, are making this sacrifice, cannot be judged by glancing at individuals or localities. One must take into consideration the whole Christian movement throughout the world, with its thousands of instances of splendid consecration, its self-denial, its rich gifts to God's work, its great army of workers, its missionaries cheerfully facing privation, peril and death—all these must be laid in the scale before the question could be justly answered. To these, we might oppose the undeniable worldliness of many so-called Christians and the decline of spiritual influence in many home churches.

Mrs. P., Norwalk, Conn. I enclose part of a letter from a clergyman. What is your opinion of what he writes concerning the attitude of some pastors toward the Bible? He writes:

We have with us at present a member of Dr. —'s church. She deplores his attitude towards the Bible; yet she says that he is strong on many other lines of truth. He does not allow for a moment that any man can save himself; he exalts faith; he pleads for a revival of religion, of course forgetful that his criticism of the Bible is hindering the accomplishment of God's plan.

It is unfortunately true that some clergymen, who have been indoctrinated with the destructive form of the higher criticism, have been led to accept the teachings of the Chicago University professors who are apparently engaged in the attempt to pull the Bible to pieces. Like others who have tried this before them, they will fail. All such are false teachers, and are leading others out into the spiritual wilderness. There can be no Christianity without Christ, and no light without revelation. That which Gladstone called "the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture," has withstood hundreds of similar assaults in the past and will never be shaken. Such men are sadly out of place in a Christian pulpit.

S. E. H., Milton, Ky. How could it be possible that God, with the power of foreknowledge, wisdom and intelligence which must have been required and employed in the creation of the universe, did not know and intend that man should sin? I am seeking truth, and this question has been a stumbling-block in my Christian pathway for many years. You have answered satisfactorily, to me at least, so many questions, that I trust you will this one also.

Your question is one which, in many different forms, has been discussed by the ablest minds, ancient and modern, and which will never be settled conclusively in this world. We must be content to trust God, and wait for enlightenment hereafter in those things that we cannot determine here. It is an error, however, to conclude that sin is the destiny of any one. God's laws, like himself, are beneficent. He has laid down laws for the harmonious government of the universe, physical as well as spiritual, and any infraction brings discord. To man has been given the power to distinguish between good and evil, between obedience and disobedience. A wrong choice brings into man's life discord, pain and all the consequences of transgression. The right choice brings peace of mind and soul content. The wrong choice makes him alien and rebel; the right brings him the blessings of obedience and a Father's love. And it should not be forgotten that God, through Jesus Christ, has opened a way for the return of the sinner; his forgiveness extends even to the uttermost.

S. E. D., Ohio. When a man who is not a Christian and does not attend church service, will not allow his wife, who is a Christian and member of the church, to attend, will God hold her accountable for not attending?

If she be forcibly restrained, of course her moral accountability ceases; also if her husband by any means makes it impossible for her to attend. A husband in this country, however, has no such power, legally, and she may assert her lawful right in the matter if she wishes. It is hardly conceivable that any husband could act in the way suggested.

Mrs. J. S., Quinton, N. J. 1. What is meant by the "evil eye"? 2. Is James 5: 14, 15 to be interpreted literally to-day?

1. It was an old superstition, and doubtless arose from the fact that the passions of pride, anger, desire and envy were expressed by the eye. To-day, in the Orient, a mother snatches a child away when she sees a stranger gazing upon it with admiration. The Hindus, too, believe in the evil eye. The ancients generally seemed to have believed that certain people had the maligtake our choice as to the origin and source of dreams. That on certain occasions, however, dreams or visions were divinely sent as warnings or portents of coming events, must be accepted, in view of all the evidence on the subject. The influence of the spirit of God extends to the sleeping as well as to the waking thoughts of the soul of man. Scripture shows us that dreams were frequently the channel of communication. From the earliest times, there have been professional diviners and soothsayers, who preyed upon the credulous by pretending to be able to interpret dreams; but Daniel, in the chapter quoted, showed that such professions were false, and that God alone can reveal the future.

P. R. R., Chicago, Ill. Matt. 1: 16 has it that Joseph, Mary's husband, was the son of Jacob, and Luke 3: 23 that this same Joseph was the son of Heli.

The genealogy in Matthew is that of Joseph, while many learned scholars hold that the genealogy in Luke is that of Mary, and that the reference in Luke to Joseph as the son of Heli, is explainable on the ground that he was Heli's son-in-law, the husband of his daughter. The second question has already been fully discussed in THE MAIL-BAG.

Rev. F. Beale, West Winfield, N. Y., referring to a recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG, writes:

Have we not a perfectly satisfactory explanation of the apparent difficulty presented in the question (the words "Good Master," addressed must try to possess her soul in patience, keep back quick words, and, while not unduly sacrificing her dignity, to yield as many points as she can. Her chance may come sometime. Later keep in mind especially the apostle's injunction not to be easily offended.

K. H., Providence, R. I. What is meant in the passage in Luke 4, verses 23 to 27?

It was as though Jesus had used the modern proverb which declares that "familiarity breeds contempt." His long residence in Nazareth, where he was known to all, would naturally dispose the people there to doubt that one of themselves, whom they knew so well, could actually do the things reported of him. In verses 26, 27, Jesus lays down the same principle, using the two prophets in illustration, viz.: that our influence and example are greater among strangers than among those who know us familiarly, and whose very intimacy is a bar to their belief in us. To your second question, we answer, certainly not, if it be the truth.

E. N. B., Punta Gorda, Fla. What is the creed of the Evangelical Alliance?

1. Hold the Scripture as inspired, authoritative and sufficient. 2. Unity of the Godhead and Trinity of Persons therein. 3. Human nature depraved by the Fall. 4. Christ's incarnate atonement, mediatorship and intercession. 5. Justification by faith. 6. Conversion and sanctification by the Holy Spirit. 7. Immortality of the soul, resurrection of the body, final judgment, rewards and punishments. 8. Baptism and the Lord's Supper. 9. Right of private judgment in interpretation of the Scriptures.

W. S., Mineral City, O. We believe that clergyman you mention has still fair eye-sight.

F. W. M., Rockwood, Pa. Send your question to the director of the Museum of Safety Devices, New York City. It is too technical for the sources of this department.

Mrs. N. W. F., Herman, Colo. 1. Already answered in MAIL-BAG. 2. Impossible to judge without knowing all the facts. 3. If conscience reproach him, he should change his employment. Only works of absolute necessity and of men are justifiable on the Lord's Day.

F. B. N., Morris Plains, N. J. A modest headdress for women in church would be strict in compliance with Biblical teaching. The towering headgear which obscures the pulpit and preacher to those in the rear, is a violation of common sense, and shows little regard for the rights of others. We entirely approve of the latter part of your letter.

J. O. B., Summerville, Ga. A liberal interpretation would be that God "permits evil" to come upon men who are living in sin. A great many books have been written on the origin of evil, yet no one is the wiser. We know, however, through God's word and by human experience that he is good to all who call on him, love him, trust him, and live according to his will. One who is in sin is in antagonism to God and a pro to evil, which is the result of sin.

Reader, Kansas. There are bold Christians and timid Christians, some of strong faith while others are weak. Pray that your faith may be strengthened. Cast aside doubts and fears, and lay hold on the promises. God himself has promised to hear us when we call upon him and Jesus has promised that whatsoever we shall ask in faith, in his name, the Father will do. God never turned away a penitent sinner. Your own unbelief may stand between you and your soul's peace, but he will remove it, if you ask him.

How They Enjoyed Mont-Laur.

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: Permit me to thank you exceedingly for the privilege that was granted some thirty or forty of our boys and girls of spending a ten days' outing at the delightful summer home of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at Nyack. I can assure you that the opportunity was greatly appreciated. You cared for those who but for your kindness would have had no outing at all, and I know how grateful the children are. I should like also to tell you at this time how much I enjoyed the Sunday afternoon I visited the Home. The buildings and grounds were far more attractive than I had believed possible, and the service in the Children's Temple was a real delight.

nant power, by the glance of the eye, to do harm to others, to bewitch cattle, etc. In Spain, the gitanos (gypsies) are believed by the ignorant and superstitious peasants to possess the evil eye to such an extent that a single glance can kill in a few hours. 2. Faith healing, which is taught by some religious sects, is the modern expression of the "miraculous healing" of apostolic days. The laying on of hands and anointing was one of the most important spiritual functions of the early Church. The modern churches generally have held that miraculous healing was withdrawn. There are many, however, who take a different view, and who contend that God still uses his faithful servants as the channel of healing.

W. P., Yonkers, N. Y. I am wiser and better since reading many of your answers and views on peculiar portions of Scripture. Will you kindly give us your views on the philosophy of dreams (Dan. 2: 26; 1: 17; 5: 12). We never hear from any of the preachers or teachers of the present age anything about dreams. Evidently the Old Testament saints believed in and spoke of them. What would have become of the child Jesus if Joseph had not heeded his dream (Matt. 2: 13)?

The ancients believed that dreams "came from above." The modern belief seems to be that they are "broken fragments of our former waking conceptions, revived and heterogeneously brought together." Since scientists disagree, we may to Christ by the rich young man and the Saviour's reply), and of all similar difficulties in the fact of the incarnation? Our Saviour being both divine and human—God and man—sometimes spoke as the former, sometimes as the latter. The case in point falls under the second rule. Here he is speaking as a man, and he so spoke because he was evidently regarded as such, and as such only, by the person addressing him as "Good Master." "Now," says Christ, "why do you call me good, I who am in your thought but a man? There is but one good—that is God." The man Christ Jesus might most properly ask such a question of one who regarded him only as a man.

Reader. How can a woman, when she lives with her husband's parents, not lose her self-respect or dignity, or become despondent, when she knows his mother dictates to the son in every particular, and the wife is supposed and compelled to take second place in every way?

It is hard for a young wife to become a member of the household of her husband's parents. Unless all concerned are kind, loving and forgiving, there will be friction, and possibly injustice and unhappiness. The daughter-in-law, being the youngest, should pray especially for light and guidance, and strive hard to promote the peace and comfort of all. The older members of the family are on their own ground; their habits are fixed, and their age demands a certain amount of respect and of concession. The daughter-in-law

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

God in the Heart*

HERE is a fine similitude implied in Paul's advice to the Ephesians to be "filled with the Spirit," instead of being "drunk with wine."

Intoxication with wine is generally considered to derive its chief fascination from the false ecstasy which it creates. One poor fellow who had become a helpless victim to its power, urged his wife to join in his potations. "Why should I be so foolish?" she asked him.

"Oh, it will make you feel so fine," he assured her. "You will think you are on half of New York."

"But what good will that do me," she asked pointedly, "when I wake up and find that I don't?"

Truly, what good! But he who is filled with the Holy Spirit is equally lifted out of himself and is made happy, and the result is an abiding peace, and a life fruitful in good works. It is a divine and blessed and beautiful intoxication.

Among the results of this possession of a man by the Spirit of God, the apostle singles out the joy which is expressed in song and melody; the gratitude which pours itself out in thanks—one of the noblest of human feelings; and—a significant and vital particular—in the humility which abhors leadership—does not desire to exalt itself above others, and makes men subject themselves to each other, "in the fear of Christ."

Vanity, or pride, is said to be the most deeply seated of human faults—yet he who is wholly possessed of the Spirit of God, has not only joy and gratitude, but he has cast out this most deeply rooted sin.

Every foreign missionary has doubtless wished and prayed that the wonderful "gift of tongues" might descend upon him. The statement is so strongly made in the New Testament, and is so often repeated in the "extra-canonical" writings, that the "gift of tongues" descended upon the disciples, that we feel sure no figure was intended, and that the disciples really did miraculously address foreign audiences, each in its own language, without previous study. We accept the statement as we accept the accounts of the other miracles.

No doubt this gift could still be bestowed if the Lord so willed. It has often been suggested that the, as yet undeveloped art of "mind-reading" may sometime become a science, and may contribute to this gift. As yet no special benefit has accrued to the world from those who amuse and astonish with it large audiences. Their achievements are too rare, too fleeting, too fleeting, to be seriously regarded. If some practical use could be made of them, so that, perchance, among other results our missionaries might be saved the long drudgery of acquiring the languages in which they hope to preach, what a help it would be to the cause of Christ!

In cases where this gift has been aimed of late years, especially in the Orient, the speakers have usually talked in a species of gibberish, unintelligible to any hearer. It must be remembered that God's true voice is ways understood. He spoke to Samuel, to Moses, to the disciples, on the Mount—and never in blind or difficult language.

The old scorn which made the Jews consider that no Gentile could possibly have a part in their salvation, is no means dead. In nearly every language, the word "foreigner" means "an enemy." We seem to be so constituted that it usually requires an effort to love one not of our own blood.

Fidelia Fiske and Persia*

THE glory of Persia has long since departed. Its rugs, its perfumes, and its poetry are still among our modern "fads"; but in diplomacy, in literature and art, in invention—in everything that goes to make a nation great—it is weak and insignificant. Squalor and poverty characterize its people. Its nobles, though hospitable and kindly, are illiterate. Its Shah is an absolute despot.

Slavery still exists in Persia, and a good Habshi girl may be bought there for $200—a strong Bombassi for $70. But the Persians are said to be easy masters, and never sell their slaves until actual want drives them to do it. They are good to their families and are especially kind to their parents. One writer upon Persia naively notes the fact that "the mother there is never left to starve," as though that were a mark of uncommon virtue. No one will dispute that the Persian possesses a fine trait, however, when we are told that he is especially good to his mother-in-law, and covets her presence in his house.

In spite of all this kindness to women on the part of the Persian men, the description of their condition as Fidelia Fiske found them when she reached Oroomiah in 1843, shows that in essentials they were really treated almost as the beasts of the field. The Persian women proper were not quite so degraded as the Nestorians—but all were regarded as ciphers. They were considered to be soulless and incapable of any mental development; and mothers wept when girls were born to them.

The labor to which this missionary was called was strenuous. Personal cleanliness, privacy, morality were almost unknown among the Nestorians. Even the missionaries who had come prepared to sacrifice all for Christ were seen to falter when they realized the revolting duties which lay before them.

But this brave and noble spirit shrank from nothing. Into the disgusting hovels where her people lived, she entered with a smile of love. Though she might be repulsed, it mattered not. She prayed and labored on, and then she came again.

No one will wonder, who reads the thrilling story of Miss Fiske's fifteen years of ministry in that benighted land, that she met everywhere at first the complaint that such teaching as she proposed would unfit the girls of Persia for the ordinary married life of its women. All wives were beaten by their husbands; all worked in the fields, having their infants beside them; all were expected to prepare their husbands' suppers when the day's toil in the fields was over. No, the "higher education" was not calculated to make women who would cheerfully accept such a lot as this.

Such faith in the saving power of the Gospel appears in few memoirs, as we see it in the life of this consecrated missionary. It seems like the old faith of the apostolic days. The stories of the persecution inflicted upon Christian Nestorians; of their fidelity, and of the hours which they spent daily in prayer sound like the Acts of the Apostles, and especially like the tales in the so-called "Extra-Canonical Gospels." The mere reading of them, of the melting and quickening power which followed upon Miss Fiske's prayers and efforts, until marvelous revivals stirred her flock, makes the reader long to go also to those distant countries where Christ is not known or is reviled; and makes one rejoice that Miss Lyon took that hard night ride of which we are told so vividly in her Life, in order to persuade Miss Fiske's parents that she ought to go as a missionary.

As to White "Castile" Soap.

"White Castile Soap is preferable to all others"—Extract from a text-book on the care of infants.

Good advice! The only objection to it is, that it is not possible to comply with it.

Why? Because more than 95 per cent. of the "Castile Soap" sold in this country is not Castile Soap at all. There is not a drop of olive oil in it.

Ivory Soap is made of the best materials that money will buy. It will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin. Use it for every purpose for which only a pure soap should be used.

HOUSEHOLD LUBRICANT

The Oil that makes things hum

There's something or other, every day, in every home, that needs a drop of oil. It may be the sewing machine or just a door hinge, but whatever it is, there's nothing takes the squeak and the hard work out of it like Household Lubricant—

Household Lubricant is a fine-bodied oil, very carefully compounded and put up in a tasty little oiler that fits a lady's hand perfectly.

It won't gum; it won't corrode; it won't get rancid. Costs only a trifle to begin with and wears a long time wherever you put it.

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

Little Margaret Kendall, when five years old, was lost in New York and several years elapsed before she was restored to her grief-stricken mother at Houghtonsville. The child had lived among the children of the streets and had acquired their ways. At her mother's home she is surrounded with every luxury, but she wishes that the poor children might share her good fortune. "Bobby" McGinnis, who knew Margaret in New York, now lives near in the same town and becomes a great friend of the little girl. Her widowed mother becomes engaged to Doctor Spencer, who was instrumental in finding Margaret in New York. The little girl is filled with horror, as all the husbands she had heard of beat their wives. She sends to the doctor a contract in which it is stipulated that he will not beat her mother; this the amused doctor signs at once. Margaret insists on a visit from the children of the "Alley," with whom she lived in the slums. At first she wants them to stay always, but consents to have it made a visit. The child, when she sees them, realizes the difference between her old life and the new and is more contented to try and live as her mother wishes. She strives to please, but finds difficulty in curbing her speech and changing her manners. Her mother and herself go back to the city with the Alley children and try to arrange for their welfare. Mrs. Kendall then sends the little girl to a fashionable school in order to give Margaret the companionship of girls of her own age who will make her forget her past experiences, for Margaret was becoming a nervous wreck brooding over the poor people in the "Alley." The doctor and his bride start on their wedding journey; the train is wrecked and both are killed. Several years elapse. Mrs. Merideth and her two brothers, Ned and Frank Spencer, sister and brothers of the doctor who married Mrs. Kendall, are living at their home, Belcourt. Margaret, who has been away at school and traveling, comes to live with them. They find her a beautiful young girl with charming ways. Margaret, riding in an automobile with a Mr. Brandon, sees for the first time the dirty mill village near Belcourt. The mills belong to the Spencers and she learns much of the way in which the firm runs its business. They nearly run over a little girl named Maggie and Miss Kendall's interest is aroused. A young man named McGinnis holds an important position in the mill and is interested in bettering the conditions of the working people. Margaret meets him by chance and finds he is the one she used to know, and that as a boy he "had come to look after her property." She tells the Spencers that he is an old friend, somewhat to their annoyance. A little girl comes to say that Maggie, daughter of Patty who lived in the Alley, is ill. Margaret supplies them with comforts and calls frequently to see how they are getting on. The child says she is "going on twelve," though much younger. At twelve they can enter the mills. Margaret urges Mr. Spencer to rectify such a condition, but in vain. She fears Ned Spencer wishes to become more than a mere friend. Margaret investigates the mills and sees many children at work. She informs Frank that she is going to live among them, and he asks if she will stay, saying her presence means everything to one at Belcourt. She thinks he refers to his brother Ned, and says, "No." She undertakes her work at "Mill House," but wonders why McGinnis does not come to see her. At last he says he has to stay away because he loved her. She thinks that she reciprocates his affection and they become engaged. Ned returns to announce that Frank has been ill, and they are all coming home. Margaret and Patty go to New York to try to find the twin sisters of Patty. They find Clarabella a teacher at Mont-Lawn, and Arabella a missionary helper in New York. The latter comes back with Margaret to help her in her work. Frank Spencer returns much changed. The news of the engagement comes as a great shock, but the Spencers decide to make the best of it. McGinnis is a regular caller, but finds himself in a new world. He only feels at home at the mills. Margaret unconsciously finds herself turning to Frank for advice in all that concerns herself except her mill work. One night the Spencers are awakened by the alarm of fire at the mills.

THE fire at the mills had caught in one of the buildings that had been closed for repairs, which accounted for the great headway it had gained before it was discovered. There was a strong east wind, and the fire was rapidly spreading, and had already attacked the next building on the west. The operatives were in a panic. There was danger of great loss of life, and all help possible was needed.

Mrs. Merideth, who heard, could only wring her hands and moan again, "I can't have them go—I can't have them go!" Yet five minutes later she sent them off, both Frank and Ned, with a fervid "God keep you" ringing in their ears.

Down in the Mill House all was commotion. Margaret was everywhere, alert, capable and untiring.

"We can do the most good by staying right here and keeping the house open," she said. "We are so near that they may want to bring some of the children here, if there should be any that are hurt or overcome. At all events, we'll have everything ready, and we'll have hot coffee for the men."

Almost immediately they came—those limp, unconscious little forms borne in strong tender arms. Some of the children had only fainted; others had been crushed and bruised in the mad rush for safety. Before an hour had passed the Mill House looked like a hospital, and every available helper was pressed into service as a nurse.

Toward morning a small boy, breathless and white-faced, rushed into the main hall.

"They're in there—they're in there—they hain't come out yet—an' the roof has caved in!" he panted. "They'll be burned up—they'll be burned up!"

Margaret sprang forward. "But I thought they were all out," she cried. "We heard that every one was out. Who's in there? What do you mean?"

The boy gasped for breath. "The boss, Bobby McGinnis an' Mr. Spencer—Mr. Frank Spencer. They went—"

With a sharp cry Margaret turned and ran through the open door to the street, nor did she slacken her pace until she reached the surging crowds at the mills.

From a score of trembling lips she learned the story, told in sobbing, broken scraps of words.

For hours Frank and Ned Spencer, together with McGinnis, had worked side by side with the firemen in clearing the mills of the frightened men, women and children. It was not until after word came that all were out that Frank Spencer and McGinnis were reported to be still in the burning building. Five minutes later there came a terrific crash and a roar of flames as a portion of the walls and the roof caved in. Since then neither one of the two men had been seen.

There was more—much more: tales of brave rescues, and stories of children restored to frantically outstretched arms; but Margaret did not hear. With terror-glazed eyes and numbed senses she shrank back from the crowd, clasping and unclasping her hands in helpless misery. It was there Ned found her.

"Margaret, you! and here? No, no, you must not. You can do no good. Let me take you home, do, dear," he implored.

Margaret shook her head. "Margaret, he can't be dead—not dead!" she moaned.

Ned's face grew white. For an instant he was almost angry with the girl who had so plainly shown that to her there was but one man that had gone down into the valley of death. Then his eyes softened. After all, it was natural, perhaps, that she should think of her lover, and of him only, in this first agonized moment.

"Margaret, dear, come home," he pleaded.

"Ned, he isn't dead—not dead," moaned the girl again. "Why don't you tell me he isn't dead?"

Ned shuddered. His eyes turned toward the blackened, blazing pile before him—as if a man could be there, and live! Margaret followed his gaze and understood.

"But he—he may not have gone in again, Ned. He may not have gone in again," she cried feverishly. "He—he is out here somewhere. We will find him. Come—we must find him!" And she tugged at his arm.

Ned caught at the straw.

"No, no, not you—you could do nothing here; but I'll go," he said. "And I'll promise to bring you the

This advertisement will bring to your attention the best and cheapest ready-roofing on the market. Here is how we have it the best.

In the first place Amatile is made of standard thickness, whereas other ready roofings range from a thin, flimsy material to a three-ply thickness.

The three-ply thickness (which is the way is only one sheet of felt) is the only kind that can be compared with Amatile.

But right here is the point. Amatile weighs more per square foot than the three-ply grade of other makes and costs much less.

Fac-simile of roll.

These facts make Amatile the most desirable roofing made.

But in addition to its superiority in material and manufacture, Amatile has one distinction which makes it stand above all others. It is a real mineral surface.

It is hardly necessary to state the advantages of such a mineral surface, the freedom from painting or coating, the perfect protection against all kinds of weather, the great durability.

This mineral surface is embedded in a layer of Pitch, the great known waterproof material. Beneath this in turn are two layers of the best grade of felt—cemented together by more Pitch, making the whole a roofing that is absolutely waterproof.

No other ready roofing can compare with this mineral-surfaced, waterproof, weatherproof, durable roof. That's what we say—Don't buy your roofing until you have seen Amatile.

In order that every reader of this paper may become familiar with Amatile, Barrett Manufacturing Company, who the largest manufacturers of roofing in the world, have offered to send free a sample of their Amatile Roofing.

We suggest that you write at once, postal mail will do. Few things are more important to the farmer than a good, tight roof, as a leaky one is an abomination and is apt to cause losses and sickness.

"The first word that I can. Come, now, you'll go home, surely!" Margaret gazed about her. Every-where were men, confusion, smoke and war. The fire was clearly under control and the flames were fast hissing in silence. Over in the east the sun was rising. A new day had begun, a day of—She suddenly remembered the sufferers back at the Mill House. She turned about sharply. "Yes, I'll go," she choked. "I'll go back to the Mill House. I can do nothing there, and I can't do anything here. But, Ned, you will bring me word—soon, won't you?—soon!" An before Ned could attempt to follow her, she had turned and was lost in the crowd.

CHAPTER XXXVIII

TUESDAY was a day that was not soon forgotten at the mills. Scarcely waiting for the smoking timbers to cool, swarms of workmen attacked the ruins and attempted to clear their way to the point where Spencer and McGinnis had last been seen. Fortunately, that portion of the building had only been touched by the fire and it was evident that the floors and roof had been carried down with the fall of those nearest to it. For this reason there was the more hope of finding the bodies unharmed by fire—perhaps even of finding a spark of life in one or both of them. This last hope, however, was sorrowfully abandoned when hour after hour passed without sign of the missing men. All night they worked by the aid of numerous electric lights hastily placed to illuminate the scene; and when Wednesday morning came, a new shift of fresh workers took up the task that had come to be now merely a search for the dead. So convinced was every one of this that the men gazed with blanched faces into each other's eyes when there came a distinct rapping on a projecting timber near them. In the dazed silence that followed a faint cry came from beneath their feet.

With a shout and a ringing cheer the men fell to work—it was no ghost, but a living human voice that had called! They labored more cautiously now, lest their very zeal for rescue should bring defeat in the shape of falling brick or timber.

Ned Spencer, who had not left the mills all night, heard the cheer and hurried forward. It was he who, when the men paused again, called: "Frank, are you there?"

"Yes, Ned." The voice was faint, but distinctly audible.

"And McGinnis?" There was a moment's hesitation. The listeners held their breath—perhaps, after all, they had been dreaming and there was no voice! Then it came again.

"Yes. He's lying beside me, but he's unconscious—or dead." The last word was almost inaudible, so faint was it; but the tightening of Ned's lips showed that he had heard it, none the less. In a moment he stooped again.

"Keep up your courage, old fellow! We'll have you both out of that soon." Then he stepped aside and gave the signal for the men to fall to work again.

Rapidly, eagerly, but oh, so cautiously, they worked. At the next pause the voice was nearer, so near that they carefully made a hole and dropped through it a rubber tube four feet long, lowering it until Spencer could put his mouth to it. Through this tube he was given restoratives.

They learned then a little more of what had happened. The two men were on the fourth floor when the crash came. They had been swept down and had been caught between the timbers in such a way that as they lay where they had been flung, a roof three feet above their heads supported the crushing weight above. Spencer could remember nothing after the first crash, until he regained consciousness long afterward, and heard the workmen far above him. It was then that he had tapped his signal on the projecting timber. He had tapped three times before he had been heard. It was dark, he said, and he could not see at first, but he knew McGinnis was near him. McGinnis had spoken once, then had apparently dropped into unconsciousness.

Once more the rescuers fell to work, and it was then that Ned Spencer hurried away to send a message of hope and comfort to Mrs. Merideth, who had come down to the Mill House to be with Margaret. To Margaret Ned wrote the one word, "Come," and as he expected, he had not long to wait.

"You have found him!" cried the girl, hurrying toward him. "Ned, he isn't dead?"

Ned smiled and put out a steady hand.

"We hope not—and we think not. But he is unconscious, Margaret. Don't get your hopes too high. I had to send for you. I thought you ought to know—what we know."

"But where is he? Have you seen him?"

Ned shook his head. "No; but Frank says—"

"Frank!—but you said Frank was unconscious!"

"No, no—they aren't both unconscious—it is only McGinnis. He—why, Margaret!" But Margaret was gone; and as Ned watched her disappear toward the Mill House, he wondered if, after all, the last hours of horror had turned her brain.

Nature's Choicest Food

The choicest Michigan beans run 23% nitrogenous — 84% nutriment. Those are the beans we buy.

They cost us, sometimes, as high as eight times what other beans would cost. But the value is there.

We bake those beans in live steam, so the skins are unbroken. They are baked until they are mealy, yet they are nutty because they are whole.

We bake in small parcels, in a heat of 245 degrees. The result is our beans are digestible. They don't ferment and form gas.

Then we make a tomato sauce from vine-ripened tomatoes. It costs us five times what common tomato sauce sells for in bulk.

We bake that tomato sauce into the beans. Thus we get our delicious blend—that sparkling zest.

The result is a food as nutritious as meat, costing one-third as much. An appetizing food—a food that all people like. A food ready to serve.

We have made beans the popular food—the every-day food—the choicest dish on the table. Are you getting your share of the benefit?

VanCamp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

Don't judge Van Camp's by other brands. Don't judge them by home-baked beans. This dish is our specialty—our claim to supremacy.

We have spent 47 years in learning how to prepare it.

We are baking more beans by several times over, than any other concern in the world.

Van Camp's are distinct. They show the cost and the skill we employ in them. They will save you work, and save your meat bills. Let your people have what they like best.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can.

TO HELP CHILDREN OF BRAZIL

"BLOSSOM HOME" is the name we have chosen for the refuge we hope to open for God's little ones in Sao Paulo when we return to Brazil. The plan is not a sudden one. The seed-thought was planted about sixteen years ago. I was walking through a Brazilian street, seeing the usual swarms of children playing about the doors. I remember how my heart yearned over those children then, and I said to the friend who was with me, "I should love to have a home for orphan children." I don't remember the thought ever forming itself definitely in my mind since, until last summer. I was reading my Bible when again the thought of a home for little children came to me. At this moment I heard my husband calling to me from the garden where he was working, and when I went to answer the call his first words were, "What do you want to do when you come back from the States?" Without a moment's hesitation, I replied, "Open a home for orphan children."

"Little Blossom"

A few days after, Mr. and Mrs. Ranken, my husband and I met for conference about several important matters. The subject of the orphanage was not on the list, but it came up, and we asked God to make his will known to us concerning this work.

We understand now why the first little Brazilian flower bloomed in our home garden. Oh, what an unpromising, ugly little bulb had to be cared for before the blossom came! It was in came pitifully insane. She used to pass our door with loud, maniac screams, calling down curses upon us. But from time to time, she heard us singing the Gospel hymns in our meetings, and this softened her, and by degrees she became friendly. One Sabbath morning she came into our meeting hall with her baby, a poor little creature, literally nothing but skin and bones, the most emaciated human being I have ever seen. There was scarcely a spark of life in the poor little body. The sight called forth such pity that both my husband and I at once felt that we must take the child and care for it, though several hours passed before each knew what was the thought of the other. The mother refused to give her up at first, but soon came back to us asking for some milk for the baby. I said, "Luiza, give us your baby and we will give her goat's milk every day, and then she may live. Your child is dying now. She can't live long as it is." She ran home, brought back the baby, and threw it into my arms, saying, "Take her; she is yours."

It would be hard now to find anywhere a happier, bonnier wee lassie.

The case of dear little Blossom is only one of thousands. What the Gospel has done for her it can do for other little Brazilian children. There are so many needy ones. Early marriages and large families are the rule in Brazil. In this great republic, larger than the United States, with the exception of Alaska, there is only one small Protestant orphanage (Lutheran), which can accommodate only a small number of children. This is in the extreme south, entirely out of reach for the children of our field.

In view of the crying need for such a work we are laying before God's people the plan for starting an undenominational home for orphan and destitute children. This work is to be in connection with the South American Evangelical Mission, to which we belong.

It has been suggested that Christian Endeavor Societies, Missionary Bands, King's Daughters' Circles, or other societies or individuals might be led of God to support or partly support an orphan child. We will gladly correspond with any one on this subject. Letters may be sent to us in care of Rev. M. M. Cooper, Knoxville, Ill.

Are You Too Thin?

For only 15 minutes a day's practice in your own room upon special exercises that I will give, you can be round, plump, wholesome, rested and attractive. Nature intended you to be—why should you not?

A pupil who was thin writes me:

"I just can't tell you how happy I am! I wore low neck and short sleeves the other night and I was so proud of my neck and arms! My busts are rounded out and I have gained 28 lbs. It has come just where I wanted it and I carry myself like another woman. My old dresses look stylish on me now. You remember I have not been constipated since my second lesson and I had taken something for years. I guess my stomach must be stronger too, for I sleep like a baby and my nerves are so rested. I feel as if I had missed so much enjoyment in life, for I never did have such good times before. I feel so well all the time."

I have built up thousands of women—why not you? You will be so much better satisfied with yourself and more attractive to your friends. I will cheerfully tell you about my work, and if I cannot help your particular case I will tell you so. My information and advice are entirely free.

A POLICEMAN'S LOT May Be a Happy One After All.

An Ill. Ex. Chief of Police found an easy and safe way out of the ills caused by coffee. He says:

"I suffered intensely from heart trouble and nervousness for five years, and though treated by some of the best physicians in this city, did not get permanent relief until I changed from coffee to Postum."

"A friend of my family was visiting at our house and seeing my condition, insisted that coffee was at the bottom of my trouble. I confess I was skeptical but promised to try Postum in place of coffee."

"It was nearly three weeks before I noticed much of any change, as my case was a bad one. Then I saw that my nervousness was gradually disappearing. A little later I was able to sleep a part of the night on my left side, something I had been unable to do for 5 years at least."

"I kept on using Postum, and the result is; so far as heart trouble and nervousness are concerned, I am a well man."

"The best proof is that I am writing this with my own hand, a thing I was unable to do for several years prior to the change from coffee to Postum."

"There's a reason."

The Sins of David

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WE SHALL never know the joy of forgiveness until we see the hatefulness of sin in the light of the holiness of God. "Fools make a mock at sin" (Prov. 24: 9), and they are fools indeed who cannot trace to sin all the misery there is upon the earth. Take sin away, and where would be the sorrow, the shame, the tears, the sickness, the death? Where would be poverty? How could war exist? Where would be prisons, lunatic asylums, hospitals, etc., if there were no sin? Who would know disappointment, heart-burning, vexation, sorrow, if there were no sin? All evil springs from this one only evil—sin.

Sin in a child of God is worse than in any other. If a worldly man, for instance, gets out of temper, one cannot wonder; he sees his powerlessness against circumstances, and frets against them; he cannot have his own way, and thinks himself wronged, and, unless he is something of a philosopher, he yields to the present mood, and gives vent to his anger. But when a child of God loses his temper, everyone feels that something is out of joint; he has no right to complain of circumstances which are overruled by his Father; if he is truly converted, he has given up his own way for God's way, and instead of thinking of himself wronged he sees his calling—to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully," and therefore, instead of losing his temper, he rejoices in tribulation, and glories in it. And if he does not do this, worldly men have a right to doubt his conversion, and to say, "These converted people are no better than we are." The world can excuse its own children, and make light of the grossest sins, but when a child of God does the same, the world rises up, not only against him, but against his God. Better to bear no witness for God than to bear false witness: and everything in our lives which is not like Christ, bears false witness of God.

God has not hidden from us the sins of David's life. Some who reckon themselves children of God take a terribly undue advantage of this, and say, "If David, the 'man after God's own heart,' was so bad—an adulterer and a murderer—what can God expect of me?" And these forget the awful consequences of his sin—the death of his infant, the incest, murder, rebellion, and open profligacy in his family—how awfully the sin of the father was visited upon his children!

David had no superficial views of sin. He says in his prayer for mercy, as soon as he sees his awful sin in the light of God (Ps. 51: 1), "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving kindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions." As far as he himself is concerned, he has nothing to plead, he cannot open his lips, but he looks at God, away from the wreck which sin has made of him, "Thy loving kindness," "Thy tender mercies"; these were his only ground of hope—it lay in what God was, not in what he was. And he pleads, "Blot out my transgressions. Wash me thoroughly, . . . cleanse me from my sin." He urges no shadow of excuse, he makes no promise; but on his own part, simply owns his sin: "For I acknowledge my transgression, and my sin is ever before me." But that is not his great burden: he had found out the treachery of his own heart—that for nine long months he should have had this awful sin upon his soul, and he had not been alive to its enormity. Till God sent Nathan, all he had thought of was to save his reputation.

Seeing sin in this light, David now sees redemption also in the light of God: his sins "forgiven," "covered," no longer imputed to him, even by a holy God; and although he knew that the fearful consequences of his sin must most certainly follow, yet he was so overcome by the goodness of God and the greatness of his salvation, that he saw himself a blessed man.

THE JOY OF FORGIVENESS*

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

A King Gone Wrong

NO APOLOGY is made for King David in the Word of God. On the contrary, God sent to him Nathan, the prophet, with a message of condemnation. His sin had been in secret, but his punishment had to be before all the people. Let us not apologize for David by saying that he lived at a time when there was a different standard of morals from ours. David was above his fellows in his understanding of God's laws. He was conscious of his sin, and it made a great unrest in his soul. Day and night he felt the hand of God heavy upon him. And his sin was not covered from the sight of men, as he supposed, but was whispered about the palace; and the people, no doubt, knew also of his murder of Uriah, plotted when Joab, his commander, placed him in the post of greatest danger in the battle front, in order that he might be killed. It was not like Joab to keep the matter secret. So we must judge that David's conduct was below the standard even of ancient morals.

David Not Blind to His Faults

But why is the account of David's sin given in the Bible? Partly perhaps to show us that the greatest and best men are imperfect, and only God is great. A young boy fifteen years of age had received a letter from one of the most renowned naval heroes of our day, granting his request for a five minutes' interview. On the evening before, he was busy brushing his clothes, blacking his shoes, getting his linen in order, so as to be ready, for the interview was to be at half past nine in the morning. The rather cool way in which he made his preparations, saying nothing at all about the matter, rather surprised a friend, who remarked, "You do not seem at all excited about the prospect of meeting the Admiral." "Why should I?" he asked, "he is only a man."

David was not like many other sinners, blind to his faults. "I am not going to church to kneel down and call myself 'a miserable sinner,' when I am no such thing," said a thoughtless woman.

An Illustration of Sin

The following incident will illustrate how one may come to the realization of sin. A little child entered a dark room, and was frightened. Her mother came and turned the slats in a shutter. A ray of sunlight streamed across the room, and in its pathway innumerable specks of dust were flying. "See the dust coming in," she exclaimed to her mother. "No," the mother replied, "the dust is already in the room, and the sun only revealed it." "I don't want to stay in such a dirty room as this," continued the child. "Let us go out, mamma." "No, child, we will open all the windows wide, and let the dust all go out. So the four windows were opened, and there did not seem to be any more dust in the air. But presently the child discovered there was dust on the chairs and tables. "Why, mamma, the dust did not go out; it just fell down. See it on the tables and chairs." "No, child, that is not the same dust you saw in the air, but other dust which the light has shown to us." Again the little girl wanted to leave the room. "No, child, let us wipe the dust off carefully and shake it out of the window." All things grew bright and shining as the dust was cleared away. "Now, let us get some clean water, and wash the dust off the floor," said the mother. And when all was finished, the child sat down in a chair and looked around and said, "Oh, mamma, this is such a beautiful room, I would like to stay here all the time." The mother sat down, for she thought it was a good time to teach her little daughter about sin in the heart. She said: "The dusty room is a picture of our sinful hearts as Jesus sees them. If he were not so loving, I think he would say, 'I do not want anything more to do with those people'; but he just lets his love shine in and gives us the wish to be clean inside, and he helps us to be good, and then we are happy." "Oh, mamma, now I know my heart is full of sin, and I am so glad to know that Jesus will help me to make it clean."

How God Cures Sin

Sharper than a two-edged sword were the words which God put into the mouth of Nathan the prophet, and David was pierced by them, and made confession, "I have sinned against the Lord." And in that state of mind, he wrote Ps. 51. "Blot out my transgression." "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity." "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." (Hyssop was used in the ceremonial for cleansing. Lev. 14: 4, 6, 51). "Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." "Blot out all my iniquities." "Create in me a clean heart." "Cast me not away from thy presence." "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation." Then the word of God came to David through Nathan: "The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die."

When blotches and pustules of disease appear, a wise physician does not seek to drive them in, he does not deal with them, but rather with the inner disease which caused them. And God deals with sin not by punishing each special sin—as mothers sometimes give specific kinds of punishment for each wrong-doing; but God cleanses the inner life by calling men to repentance.

David yielded when God reproved him, but all persons will not do this. They keep right on in their bad way. A story is told of two boys who on a mountain began to roll a ball of snow. It soon grew to be the size of a hog's head, and then it broke away from them and began to roll rapidly down the side of the mountain, every moment gaining in size until it was like an avalanche. It tore down a cabin in its path, and broke a wagon to pieces, and at last made a bound into the river, striking a small boat, sinking it and all on board. Such is the course of a man or a woman when they go on in sin, after God has called them to repentance. We learn from David how to stop short, with prayer on our lips for full and free forgiveness.

A Dead Child in the House

The father lay upon the ground seven days and nights, and prayed for the life of the child. And though David had been forgiven, his home must be purged. And so God struck the child with sickness, and on the seventh day it died. But in this bereavement God was gracious to David.

A King Worshiping in God's House

When David was told that his child was dead, he arose from the earth, and bathed himself and changed his clothing, and came into God's house, and worshiped him there. It was not until after he had returned to his own house that food was set before him to break his long fast. Very probably it was while he was in God's house that he uttered that psalm—our lesson today—which more than any other epitomizes the joy of forgiveness of which our Golden Text is the keynote: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." It is said that St. Augustine often read this psalm with weeping heart and eyes, and before his death had it written upon the wall which was over against his sick-bed, that he might be comforted by it.

Because God loves us he calls us to repentance. The greatest light-giving torch the world has ever seen is the verse, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life" (John 3: 16).

Here is an allegory about the power of forgiveness and love: "I'll master it," said the axe, and his blows fell heavily on the iron, but every blow made his edge more blunt until he ceased to strike. "Leave it to me," said the saw, "and with its relentless teeth it worked backward and forward on its surface until they were worn down and broken; then it also fell aside. "Ha! ha!" said the hammer, "I knew you would not succeed." "I'll show you the way." But at his first fierce stroke off flew his head, and the iron remained as before. "Shall I try?" asked the soft, small flame. They all despised the flame, but the flame curled gently around the iron and embraced it and never left it until it melted under its irresistible influence. The allegory needs little interpretation. There are hearts hard enough to resist the force and fury of wrath, and rebuke and scorn—these will even recoil; but there is a power stronger than any of these, and hard indeed is the heart that can resist love.

David thought of burnt offerings for sin, and of the scapegoat that on the Atonement Day carried the sins of the people into the wilderness, to return no more. All of these pictured the Christ dimly, but sufficiently for David to take hold on God as the God of his salvation.

The Blotting Out of Sin

What is the blessing of the blotting out of sin? A little boy ran in one day to his mother, after he had read that promise, "I will blot out as a thick cloud thy transgressions," and he said: "Mother, what does God mean when he says he will blot out my sins? What is he going to do with them? I can't see how God can really blot them out and put them away. What does it mean—blot out?" The mother, who is often the best theologian for a child, said to the boy: "Didn't I see you yesterday writing on your slate?" "Yes," he said. "Well, fetch it to me." He fetched the slate. Holding it in front of him, the mother said: "Where is what you wrote?" "Oh," he said, "I rubbed it out." "Well, where is it?" "Why, mother, I don't know." "But how could you put it away if it was really there?" "O mother, I don't know. I know it was there, and is gone." "Well," she said, "that is what God means when he says, 'I will blot out thy transgressions.'"

Dear Dr. Klopsch: I have received your splendid premium, the Red Letter Bible, and feel very grateful for such a prize, as I have been a long time wishing to possess it. I thank you for such a valuable premium. The print is plain and clear and every way its improvements on other copies are valuable. I am more than satisfied with the Bible.

MEXICAN DIET

Not Conducive to American Energy

"After about thirteen years in Mexico where I was on a Mexican diet into which coffee and greasy food enter largely, I find that everything I ate distressed me," was a man from our neighboring republic. "Nervous break-down with pain in heart caused me to give up mental work. After trying various stomach remedies without benefit, I found relief, at last, by eating Grape-Nuts and cream."

"I could digest Grape-Nuts, and the heart and nervous symptoms soon improved, such an extent that I could do some book work and a fair day's manual labor."

"When away from home I get out of shape from eating wrong food, but at home a few days on Grape-Nuts puts me right again."

"I once worked to consecutive hours of sleep without much fatigue, by having a box of Grape-Nuts in my pocket and eating a little dry, whenever I felt faint. I can teach all day without fatigue, after a breakfast of Grape-Nuts and cream, stewed fruit and Postum."

"That old dull feeling, when I tried to do my former diet, has disappeared and the delightful sensation of being fully nourished is present now. And the smile on our months old boy at a sight of a Grape-Nut package is worth seeing." "There's a R. son."

The White Slave Trade of To-day is one of these incredible things," begins Mr. Sims' article. Every woman and girl in America will be benefited by reading this article by the great federal attorney who is doing such good work to rid our land of a "Traffic which would, by contrast, make the Congo slave traders of the old days appear like Good Samaritans."

Questions and Answers

H. B. D., How does a spider take its web across through an open space, ten feet above the ground, from one tree top to another when the trees are twenty-five feet apart?

The spider takes advantage of air currents. It tries to spin its web at a time when a breeze will carry the threads toward a branch it has probably selected. Sometimes it makes many fruitless efforts to accomplish this. If the light film strikes the bark it will catch hold.

Reader, Oakdale, Calif. 1. In a business meeting, ought a nomination to be made and seconded the same as a motion? 2. Ought the regular reports of secretary and treasurer to be accepted formally by the society? 3. Of what house was Queen Victoria a descendant—Tudor or what?

1. and 2. Yes, in both cases. 3. Queen Victoria had blood of the house of Stuart in her veins, and through it was descended from Henry VII., a Tudor, whose daughter married James IV., who was slain at Flodden in 1513. Her own immediate ancestors were of German blood. Her father was the Duke of Kent, who was the son of George III. George III. was the son of George II., born in Hanover, Germany. He was the son of George I., who was the son of the Elector of Saxony, whose mother, Elizabeth, was a daughter of James I. of England. Remotely she was descended from the Guelphs.

E. R. S., New York. What prominent prophecies are yet to be fulfilled before the coming of our Lord?

"Nation shall rise against nation"—a great war; great religious revivals; the ascension of 144,000 Christians; more wars, also famines, pestilences and earthquakes; the spread of infidelity and rise of Antichrist; the Great Tribulation, or persecution of the Christians; the battle of Armageddon; the Second Advent and the millennium.

W. G. G., Pittsburg, Pa. After reading the thirty-first chapter of Numbers, do you think Moses was the "meek" man he is represented to have been in the twelfth chapter of Numbers and third verse?

The whole verse in question is apparently a parenthesis and is supposed by commentators to have been written, not by Moses of himself, but by Ezra, or some later prophet. Several authorities give the more accurate rendering as "very afflicted," in the sense of having many things to vex and discourage him in dealing with the people, and yet being calm and forbearing. The Hebrew phrase, it is declared by eminent scholars, would be more correctly translated, "much-enduring."

R. J., Indianapolis. Now that trans-Atlantic cheap postage has become an accomplished fact, our postal service will doubtless increase. Where is the smallest post office in the world?

It is said that up to a very recent date at least the smallest post office in the world was that which was kept in a barrel that swung from a rock over the Straits of Magellan, opposite Terra del Fuego. It was opened by passing ships to take or deposit letters. Every ship took all of the letters it could transmit.

Constant Reader, Montreal, Can. In one of David's Psalms it says, "Ask of me and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance." How is this passage to be interpreted?

This Psalm is construed by commentators as referring to the coming Messiah, God's Anointed, who will rule in Zion and have all the nations subject unto him, his dominion extending over the whole earth.

Reader. 1. Whom did Cain marry? Was it his sister? 2. Was China inhabited before the present Chinese race, and by whom? 3. How many years after Christ was born was the New Testament written?

1. Answered repeatedly in THE MAIL-BAG. 2. The origin of the Chinese race is lost in antiquity. It goes back to a period nearly 3,000 B.C. according to Chinese tradition, when as a horde of wanderers, they lived in the forests of Shan-si.

Who the people were who preceded them is unknown. Chinese legends call them "fiery dogs," "great bowmen," "mounted warriors," "the black-haired race." Ethnologists assume that they may have been Tartars, like the Jungs of the West and the Tekes, the ancestors of the Tekke-Turcomans of the North. 3. The oldest documents extant belong to the third and fourth centuries A.D., others to the three centuries following.

W. G. M., Oxford, O. Some time ago one of your readers asked this question through THE MAIL-BAG: What are we to understand by the heart, soul and spirit? An eminent divine writes as follows:

"The heart and soul and spirit are sometimes used in Scripture to designate the same thing, viz., our spiritual being as distinguished from the physical. This much of difference may be named: 'heart' usually denotes affection; 'soul' denotes the life we have in common with other creatures worldly career and robs him of his hopes of a future life, for it is written, 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.' (I. Cor. 6: 10.)

Jess. B., Rahway, N. J. How old is the fashion of wearing the high silk hat?

It is believed to have originated in Florence, where it was of a more conical shape than now. It was introduced in France about 1825, and has since spread pretty widely over the civilized world.

Inquirer, Philadelphia, Pa. Is the settlement "Lincoln," which was founded in Africa by Heli Chatelain, still in existence?

We have heard nothing of it in years. Mr. Chatelain died in Lausanne, Switzerland, lately. He was identified with Bishop Taylor's African missions, was an expert linguist, and translated the Gospels into Kimbundu. He was the organizer of the Philafrican League, which began operations in Africa thirteen years ago. Mr. Chate-

Dr. Peters in his famous The Great Hereafter (published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price $2.50), treats exhaustively of the future life, and shows the almost universal belief of all ages in immortality with ideas preserved.

Emma F. Manhasset, N. Y. How old is the science of aeronautics? When was the first balloon ascension made?

It is almost as old as the discovery of hydrogen gas by Cavendish in 1760. Black had the suggestion of its lifting power. In 1783 the brothers Montgolfier, of France, filled paper bags with hot air, which ascended. The same year Charles, of Paris, sent up the first hydrogen-filled balloon, and the year also Joseph and Stephen Montgolfier ascended in a balloon, and MM. Robert and Charles also made ascensions.

G. E. S., Glenville, Neb. 1. What is the percentage of the descendants of the English, now residing in the United States, in comparison with the percentage of any other foreign race residing in the United States? 2. What is the number of foreigners now residing as citizens of the United States in comparison with the English?

1. Population of foreign parentage, according to last census, 26,198,939, of which 2,146,271 were of English birth or descent. The census shows 7,832,681 of German parentage or descent, 4,987,707 of Irish parentage or descent, and 1,319,141 of Canadian-English parents or descent. 2. Total foreign population by birth or descent, 26,198,939. [Your own questions can be answered by reference to any modern encyclopedia or history. Write to the National Observer, Washington, D. J. J., Atlanta, Ga. Where did the story of "the phoenix rising from its ashes" originate?

It is one of the world's oldest myths. Even before the days of Job and David, it was a popular tradition in Palestine and Arabia. The phoenix was a type of immortality of the soul. Jewish rabbins wrote that all birds adopted the example of the first woman and ate of the forbidden fruit except the phoenix, which obtained a certain immortality as its reward. The fable ran that the bird lived 500 years, made its nest of spices, lighted it by the molting of its wings, was consumed and rose, recreated from its own ashes, to a new life.

A NOTABLE WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

LARGE families of such sturdy American stock as that of James Hyde, of Hyde Park, N. D., are rare in these days, but the members of such are certainly entitled to congratulations. The above picture was taken at the fiftieth anniversary of the wedding of Mr. and Mrs. Hyde. Relatives and friends came from far and near to participate in the festivities, and were photographed that Mr. and Mrs. Hyde might have a pleasant reminder of the happy occasion. Mr. Hyde has been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years and is greatly interested in its pages.

and also often our spiritual being; 'spirit' nearly always means our spiritual nature pure and simple. All three, however, belong to our inward being as distinguished from our corporal being."

O. O. J., Cazadero, Ore. Is it harmful to participate in a "raffle"?

A raffle is a game of chance and therefore gambling. The same objection in degree is applicable to raffles that applies to all forms of gaming, although some are certainly worse than others.

Mrs. T. C. B., Tomah, Wis. What reason can be given now why one should be a total abstainer that were not used thirty years ago?

Education has enlightened the public concerning the evil effects of alcohol on the human system. It has also revealed results, personal and transmitted, which were not known to earlier times. Besides, the drinker is no longer tolerated in decent society. He is not wanted by employers in any calling we know of. He cannot hope to succeed in any business or profession, and many are closed to him. Insurance companies draw the line against him. One of the first things an employer wants to know is whether a man drinks or not; if he does, then his chances are practically nil. Our leading physicians are almost a unit against the use of alcohol. Publicists have taught the people how the drink traffic is responsible for the bulk of our crime and pauperism, and how it swells our taxes. The moral side of the question speaks for itself. A home where drink rules, is no home. It demoralizes and brutalizes all it touches, and drags down the innocent and the guilty alike. It stamps out the image of God in man, ruins his

W. B., Jacksonville, Fla. What is the popularly accepted meaning of "cosmos"?

It means the globe or the universe considered as an orderly and harmonious system, as opposed to "chaos." Homer used the term to denote "order," and other philosophic writers applied it to the celestial and terrestrial order, and to the harmony of nature and the world generally.

F. M., Petersburg, S. C. Do our loved ones who have died and gone, as we trust, to Heaven, know anything about our circumstances here upon earth?

Such is the belief of the Christian Church throughout the world. Conscious life after death has been the theme of the greatest scientists, philosophers and thinkers in all ages. It is a world-wide belief, though not demonstrable by human methods. It must be accepted in faith. It is very clearly realized, however, by those who, through holy living and keeping near to God, find developing in themselves a sense of spiritual perception, which is impossible to one who is wrapped up in the affairs of the world and the body. To the aged saint, the veil between the two worlds becomes almost transparent. As to the preservation of identity and memory in the future life, the Bible clearly teaches it. David, speaking of his dead child, says (II. Sam. 12: 23) "I shall go to him, but he will not return to me," implying recognition. Paul (Heb. 1: 14) tells us of the "ministering

LIFE IN "THE CHILDREN'S VILLAGE"

By KATE UPSON CLARK

ENTERING the broad grounds of the "New York Juvenile Asylum," and admiring the grand woods and hills through which you are passing, you may ask, as many other visitors do, "How soon do you come to the Children's Village?" "You are in it now."

"I thought that this was some splendid park." "No, these truly superb grounds, with their rich variety of forest, knoll and meadow, are only the setting in which its wise and philanthropic conductors have placed this important institution; and you think, 'It should be easy to be good and hard to be bad in such a place.'"

That this is the practical outcome of living here you learn from the matron of one of the numerous cottages.

"Do you have any trouble with the twenty boys under your charge?" "Never; they are just as good as they can be."

There are other and perhaps more powerful agencies at work for the regeneration of the five hundred who have been placed here for care and improvement, but the beautiful and peaceful surroundings must have no small influence for good.

The Village lies in the town of Cauncey, in Westchester County, New York; but may be easily reached from either Dobb's Ferry or Hastings. The scenery around it is among the finest of that which has made the Hudson River valley famous. It was a great day for the "New York Juvenile Asylum" when it was removed from its close and unfavorable quarters in the city, to this noble site. No walls confine the children, though many of them are classed as "disorderly," and even "incorrigible," and all brought to what may properly be called "the neglected tenth" of society. Like many others of the most intelligent workers among the poor and the vicious, the managers of the Children's Village have decided that the best restraint, the more likelihood of reformation. For hardened criminals, confinement behind high walls; for those who know only the beginning of sin, freedom, limited only by a wise surveillance. Honor can not grow except by exercise; and the children in this wonderful Village are given as much freedom and latitude as may be in order to develop this foundation quality of character.

The establishment of the cottage system here has been another step forward in the progress of judicious care for the unfortunate. The great central institution idea has been abolished. The children are divided into groups of about twenty. Each child has his separate sleeping room, often partly furnished with tables, shelves, or other articles made by his own hands. The matron or master of the house knows each boy thoroughly.

The new buildings, the cottages, the schoolhouse, the hospital, even the power house, are built not only with regard to the very newest plans for light, heat and general convenience, but to beauty. They fit the fine landscape and are a constant education to the eye.

The "Juvenile Asylum" was founded by Peter Cooper more than fifty years ago, and has always required more or less of private assistance. It would have been almost impossible to maintain the present high standard of excellence in the personnel and equipment if the city alone were responsible. The city pays per capita for all those committed to the asylum under its auspices, the smallest sum paid in any similar public charity. As this sum can only be afforded where most of the service is given for virtually nothing, as is the case among some of the religious orders, it will be seen that it does not cover the cost of the city's charges in a place like the Children's Village, where the officers and employees are all first-class. In order to keep up the high standard attained there, it is imperative that its friends should put their hands deep into their pockets. Memorial houses and memorial endowments are sorely needed there, and money could not be more hopefully invested than in this noble work among the unfortunate children of the metropolis.

For the first time in a long course of years the Juvenile Asylum in 1907 was placed by the State Board of Charities in the first class; that is to say, it is adjudged by them to have no material defect. It is believed that this is the only one of its numerous charges to be

Who Is A Christian?

TEXT:
"Follow me." — John 1:43.

THE request of Jesus, "Follow me! Follow me!" What is it to be a Christian? These are days in which that question is in the air all about us. There are very many answers that are purely human; honest and earnest endeavors of earnest and honest men to help their fellows; but after all the true answer is to be found in that Book, if we can but sift it out. I have heard some complaint of the omission of which the evangelist made mention when he said that if all the things which Jesus did and said were written, the books of the world could not contain them, and they regret that the Scriptures are not ampler. I never felt that regret. It is too large a book for me as it is. I, who am finite, come to this volume which is infinite to sift out of it the answer to this question: What is it to be a Christian?

Imagine yourself Philip. You are a full-grown man. You dwell in this land instead of Palestine, in the year 1908 instead of the year 27, but otherwise, let us imagine, you are Philip. You are a sincere seeker after truth. Like him you have talked with Nathanael and Peter, wise and devout men, your neighbors; like him you have turned over the pages of that Scripture to find out the truth that shall be applicable to your life. You have in quiet confessed yourself at times sorely sad-hearted. You never professed yourself right, you wouldn't say that you are now; but, oh, how anxious you are that you should be right! What is it to be a Christian? So some winter's day—this was in the winter in the year 27—you are apart from the crowd in some solitary place. This was apart from the crowd in the foot-hills to the left of the Jordan, whither they retired with Jesus.

A Heart-Searching Query

You are away. Let it be some loved country-side. Are you very happy where you go in summer? The old farm? Is the thought of it restful to you now? Is it quiet there, conducive to self-examination, and intimate knowledge of your own soul? Away from the sidewalk so full; away from the thoroughfares which have been this last week like quagmires; up there, where the snow is like a pavement of silver under your foot; away from the thronging meetings, and the hot questions or the revival services. Such pure skies, such voiceless air, such inspiration in the sunlight, such seclusion, such solitude! And these questions search your heart, "What is it to be a Christian? Am I a Christian? No, would to God I were! How shall I find the truth concerning myself? Men talk to me about the blush of shame and the conviction of sin. Is it to cringe under the spots upon my manhood, the stain upon my soul, as this snow reveals the stain from the rot in the broken limb of the maple dripping and drizzling upon it? I do. I wish I was washed out. They talk about the new life. Is it to wish oneself to have become what God originally made him? True to his own being, as is this snowbird who dare fly up to the very face of God and sing in his ear? Is it to be as perfect a man, as is this bright winter's day in nature? Oh, God, would I were such a man! That I, a human being, were as these creatures of the wing are, and as this inanimate creation is!" You approach and put your hand on the bough of an evergreen, along which the fresh fallen snow is encrusted now, and holding it gently, you mark its graceful contour of wreathed beauty. Does it know that it is beautiful? Not at all. The bough did not make itself so. No.

"Follow Me!"

"God of nature, this is thy handiwork. Thou hast made this evergreen beautiful with the fairy grace of the snow. Oh that some one would take my nature and fashion it into shapes of grace, adorn it, make it beautiful in the garniture that is above my imagining, as this bough is beautiful." Then your hand shakes a little, and off falls the snow. "There," you sadly exclaim, "that is myself exactly. I have had my hour or moment that I was beautiful with the mere frosted loveliness of goodness; and then the movement of some passion's trembling, and it is gone. I need to be made beautiful and kept in some moveless, passionless air by God's own hand!"

What is it to be a Christian? Why, as you walk back and forth under the leafless maples, your shoe making its noise on the frosty crust, suddenly, Jesus appears to you! He comes as a man of thirty years of age, graceful in movement, modest in dress, tender and solicitous of countenance, and somehow you recognize that it is he. So he did come to men's houses. So he came to Zaccheus; so he came to Nicodemus; so he came to the home of Mary and Martha. To many a man's dwelling came he, and so he comes to you. You recognize him there under the maples. You know that it is he who has turned this world right side out. It is he who has been the hope of all wise statesmen and benefactors of your race; it is he who spake as never man spake, and he has come to you. You are conscious that he reads your heart. You feel as he passes the well-sweep that he has read you through and through. Coming nearer, he puts out his hand and softly says, "Follow me. Follow me."

The Heart's Answer

Now, what would you do if it were so? Would you begin to plead excuses that your time was occupied? No. He came to your village; his shoe has tracked the highway, the mile down to the bridge, the other mile to the schoolhouse, and the forks of the road. His eyes have scanned every residence; he saw the well; he has passed the tree by the entrance; he has seen you under the maple, and he has come to you with this question, "Follow me?" What would you do but cry out instantly, "Yea, Lord, whithersoever thou goest! How I have longed for this time; wondered that thou never camest to us as to men of old; my heart has been crying out for thee." "Follow me." Yes, your knee would make a print where your shoe had been at his feet. "My God, I give to thee this day, I give to thee this week, to follow thee whithersoever thou goest, and be thy disciple and learner."

Then this reply, "Thou needest not to follow me if thou canst give only this day or this week. No, but follow me this week, this year, two years, five years, ten years, and learn of me." And your heart is heavy, for you are due at your desk on Monday. Still, the question has wrought on you so that you are almost ready to excuse yourself from other duties and vow, "Lord, a week, a month!—but a year to follow thee? To sit at thy feet and learn of thee? But my factory." Then he surprises you with, "You need not give up the factory. I will go with you to the factory. If I will be your teacher may I go before you to the office? May I go with you to the bench? Would you follow me, doing those things which you are set to do—me, the Carpenter's Son?"

Christ in Our Daily Lives

Now, suppose you said, "Yes." Would that make you a Christian? Yes. Are you now a disciple of Christ? What else are you? Are you now a follower of Jesus? What else are you? You say, "Jesus, I go back to the factory with thee; lead me all the way." Oh, I have seen many a factory where Jesus toils. That same Master, who, in his early lifetime sought men out in the fishing-smack, and helped them out with their catch; that same Jesus who sympathized with Mary and Martha in their household cares; that same Lord who himself, until man's estate, shoved the jack-plane as a carpenter; that same one offers to lead every man into the factory, to go before you into the shop, to stand by you in the store, or the office. I see two workmen toiling at the bench, and only one of them asks for his wages Saturday night. I see two workmen pacing at the lathe, one with hands busy upon the machinery, and the other with the fan of refreshment, the regalement of patience, the help of the flagging mind and flesh, breathing the inspiration to be something more and better, bending over the lathe-worker and whispering, whispering, whispering in his ear that he may be led up, up, up to higher hopes and purposes. I see two laborers standing at the forge, one with blackened, smoke-stained visage and soiled clothing; the other in such garments of white as no fuller on earth can white them. I see two who leave the cottage to go to the factory door, and One turns the other aside from the dram-shop, returns with him to the place of his toil, stands by him at the loom, keeps all the hours of the whistle and the bell to help his fellow workmen to be true. "Follow me. Will you follow me? May I lead you to the factory? Will you be such a mechanic, such a laborer as I will teach you to be?"

"Ah, but," says some one, "how about your theology? You said that would make me a Christian! Do you believe that you could live in such constant association with that Stainless Life, lapped in its bosom, circled in his arms, with his silken robe against your serge all day long in the shop, and continue such a man as you were before? Do you believe it possible that you could live so close to him and you remain a lump of ice under this sunlight which glanced from his eye?"

Suppose now this question is addressed to some buyer and seller, "May I lead you? Will you be disciple, a learner of me? May I say that you are a follower of Christ? That you are a learner of the feet of him who came from heaven to earth to teach men?" You reply, "I am a merchant. Promptly he, laconically, 'Follow me! Follow me! May I have the keys to the store?' 'But, Lord, the porter has the keys to the store. This servant opens the store in the morning.' 'May I dominate the porter? Would you like the store to be open by the Christ hand? May I display the goods in the Christ spirit? May I write all advertisements for the press? May I buy and sell, make the bargains, and see that whatever goes in or out is according to the Golden Rule? May I take the utmost charge of this business of thine? May I be the heart of the floor-walker? Would you wish Christ to be the inspiration of the cash-girl, in the bosom of the credit-man, bending over the books of the office?' Can you say, 'Lord God, would that were so?' Man, what are you, if you are not Christ-follower? You have given up the store, turned it all over to him. He has the key."

The Christian in Business

Ah, what a merchant Jesus would have made if I had been a merchant instead of a carpenter! The magnificent health of his, that splendid genius that flashed from his eyes and enabled him to contrive men and read the future, that beautiful uprightness with which he dealt with men! How ever one would have flocked to buy of him! What trading marts would have been built up! What reputation would his portals have gained for just dealing, uprightness, and purity! He would have monopolized the trade of the world. You wouldn't dare to put your business in the hands of a minister. You say the clergy are dreamers. But in the hands of him who manages the earth, the seas, and the stars; in the hands of this financier, whose every outgo and tide makes such a sure deposit, and every income tide writes its check exact upon the shore, you can safely trust your business. My Lord God, here is the key. Hereafter you are conscious all the time of following Christ the merchant. Every morning as you open the mail you do it under the sanction and inspiration of that life which was the most beautiful the world ever saw. You have the consciousness that Jesus Christ knows about your affairs at the bank; Jesus Christ knows whatsoever is said about buying and selling; Jesus Christ settles all questions of taste. What is the beautiful but a part of the good and the true? Who ever has such taste as this Jesus Christ, who painted the sunset, adorned the wing of the bird, who fills all nature with the æsthetics which are beyond the possibility of any painting hand? You turned the store over to him, everything, and it is all his, and you bowed at his feet.

The New Birth

But, you object again. You say, "This is all imagination. It is not true." It is every word true and the trouble with our modern theology is we put Jesus Christ into Sunday and lock him up; we lock him into the Bible, and we don't let the Bible come in and overflow and overflow every day of our lives. "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

"Follow me. Follow me." It is the one same laconic question of Jesus to every man, woman, and child; and when the whole heart says, "Yea, I follow thee," that instant you become a Christian. I care not just now for any definition and limitations of a creed; you, who with all your heart say, "I am thine," what are you, if you are not a disciple? What are you, if you are not a Christian? Possibly

"The Little Church Around the Corner"

THE Church of the Transfiguration at No. 5 East Twenty-ninth Street, New York, has so long borne this pseudonym that its real name has been almost forgotten. The incident which caused this title to be given is still fresh in the minds of our citizens, though it occurred many years ago, and has been repeatedly denied. It was said that the use of a certain great church on New York's most famous and fashionable avenue was refused when wanted for the funeral of a well-known actor.

"But," said the pastor, "there is a little church around the corner where the exercises might perhaps be held."

The story goes that they were held there and that Rev. George Hendric Houghton, the noble pastor, himself officiated, lovingly and tenderly; thus endearing himself not only to the whole theatrical profession, but to all broad-minded Christians.

His nephew and successor, the Rev. George C. Houghton, has pursued the same policy which distinguished the administration of his uncle. "The Little Church Around the Corner" has therefore stood always for an all-embracing love and catholicity. Possibly this may sometimes have been carried too far, but, if so, the people have loved it all the better, and God's blessing has surely seemed to rest upon it.

On October 4, the sixtieth anniversary of the founding of the church was celebrated. The altar was banked with flowers, against masses of green. An orchestra assisted the organ, and three of the six services held during the day were musical.

The only sermon preached was by Rev. Dr. Wilford L. Robbins, Dean of the General Theological Seminary. It was upon the subject of God's sounding love.

Dr. Robbins dwelt upon the prosperity which had followed the church from its beginning. Starting in poverty, it had gone on from year to year, never knowing beforehand just how its expenses were to be met, until very lately. Now it has an endowment fund of $200,000, a large and growing membership, a flourishing chapel on Sixty-ninth Street, and many beautiful and costly decorations.

The Church of the Transfiguration has been added to from time to time until the originally small structure has become very large. It is low and rambling in form, but quite picturesque. Much of its prosperity has been due to the gifts of the actors whom it has befriended, and the undoubted increase of morality among this perhaps most conspicuous class in our modern city life, may have been largely due to the devoted efforts of Dr. Houghton and his band of earnest helpers. There is plenty more to do in this line, in spite of all that has been accomplished; and every Christian will wish for "more power to the elbow" of the present pastor of this unique and useful church.

Slips had been issued at the anniversary services asking for $2,500 for the current expenses of the church, and this amount was readily given.

The romances clustering about "the Little Church Around the Corner" have been legion. The weddings and funerals which have taken place there have often, perhaps usually, had "a history" behind them—sometimes one of shadows—sometimes with more of light than gloom, but nearly always of public interest. It has done a needed work in the world, and whatever may have been its mistakes, they were made in love, and the Recording Angel has not set them down. Warm congratulations and wishes for long life and continued prosperity are universally extended to it on its sixtieth anniversary, and may it grow especially in its capacity to attract the brilliant and erratic class to which, out of all our churches, it has seemed most to appeal.

You object that that is not that passing richness of experience which is called the new birth. Yet will not that ensue? Do you suppose it is possible, I ask again, that you can live in such conscious intimate companionship with the Holy Master and remain the same man, with the same old nature, you were before? Do you think he will long associate intimately with you, and not be the Master in love of your whole being and the Lord of all your affection? You, in an intimacy with him that shall be as close, as deep as that of the mother and the child!

I have a friend in a certain city, a strong man, well-titled in all his love of the present world. I often think of him as being almost too much devoted to it; think and fear for him lest he get, one so good to him, very near the verge of the forbidden love of this world, and yet I do not believe he has passed the forbidden. In his office are three pictures fronting him whenever he glances up; one of his wife, a most gracious lady, another of his growing and promising son, and another of the pretty little daughter, in one frame on his desk standing under his eyes; and all the energy which drives that store and two or three factories, and is threatening to make him prematurely old, all that comes from his devotion to those three faces. I do not believe that it is possible for that man to sit down at that desk and do a deed or write a line that shall ever bring disgrace upon that boy or girl or the woman who walks at his side. Even so is it possible for a human life to dominate an affectionate man.

I suppose all of you work, some of you even in disome and dark places of daily toil, with these faces of your loves hung about you in dream, although they may not be there in reality. One has most had his hand in the jaws of the lion of some cruel sin, when the remembrance of the face of a good wife has warned him to withdraw it. There is no such moral sanative as the presence at the store of a pure-hearted wife and a baby or two, who come over to visit you now and then. Happy is that man who goes home every day to lunch, and washes off the dust of the street in the penetralia of home! When they come into the office, you put your pen behind your ear and stretch back in your chair; the cobwebs seem to fade out of the dingy office windows, the sunshine of their presence. "I am glad to see you. What is it you want? Money? All that I have is yours." And after they have gone you sit a moment in soft delight of memory, before you take the pen down. They pick their way out among the boxes and bales and depart; but there is a perfume of sweet affection left by the gentle visitors, about those old casks; and up among the pails and kettles, hung at the ceiling hooks, there is a ring and echo of the laughter of the baby; out by the window sashes, cleansed from the shining of their eyes, the cobwebs are swept, and they don't come back for half a day. Happy is he who is beleaguered, now and then, by those whom he loves in the midst of his days of toil!

Now, can a man be dominated like that by a human life and its loves, and not be changed into something rich and strange by constant association with Jesus Christ? There is many a man, a son, who coming under the old sign of his father, and being the master of the business at length, remembers the commercial creed of his sire, and he solemnly vows, "as his father kept his business honorable and prosperous, so shall the son do afterwards."

Any man and every man who says, "All my business, all that I am, all my beliefs, all my obligations, body and soul, shall be taught and dominated by Christ," he is a Christian.

Who is the singer? Only those who can sing with the lips? No, I am a singer, too, if I can sing in my heart. Don't you know a songstress who used to sing before her hair turned white, or before some disaster overtook her; but of late years with her vocal cords all shattered by that attack of diphtheria, every now and then as she returns from a concert, she pulls down the window, shuts the door and locks it, and sits down to the piano—that piano which once was discordant in contrast with her glorious tones—and with the score of the piece at the concert before her, she accompanies herself with the cracked voice, until her dissonance is too much even for her own ear; and with her eyes all tears to think that the day of her audible song is gone, she plays the glorious score through and sings it in her soul. All the rippling trills, all the glorious harmonies, all the eagle flights, all the majesty of the score is in her soul, but her lips are dumb! I tell you the man who knows the score of the life of Jesus Christ like that, who sits before it, even though his own cracked voice is such a grief; yet sings it through in his own soul and says, "Would God I might be like that! It shall have all the dominance of my being!" that man is a Christian.

O thou glorious Choir-master, thou New Jerusalem Singer, I see thee this morning with the lifted baton, and thou turnest unto each of us and sayest, "Follow me. It shall be a hymn of sweet charity." Lead on, thou Choir-master divine, and we will try to follow thee. "Follow me. It shall be a hymn of self-sacrifice and Christian devotion." Lead on, we will follow thee. "Follow me. It shall be a hymn full of sorrow for the mistakes of the dead past and of resolves for the new future." Lead on, we will try to follow thee. "Follow me. It shall be the hallelujah chorus over our besetments, the world, the flesh, and the devil, and victory at last." Sing on, we will try it, we must! All our soul is singing now!

Oh, I seek for words with which to depict it, to describe it, what it is, this passing strange and beautiful companionship. You have been wayward, and you go to the old home and sit by the armchair of your mother at Thanksgiving time, and her white hands are upon your brow, and her gentle words in your ear, and you go away saying, "I never spend an hour with her but it makes me a better man." But to be with Christ all day long and all night long, comforted by his presence, until at last he leads you to Calvary, and you see him die on the cross for you, and your heart cries out, "My Leader, my Master, my Lord, my God, my Saviour!"

That is the completion. The completion of discipleship? Not quite. There is another journey, man's last long journey. In that hour there is another, a final call. It comes softly floating down, I think, like a strain of celestial harmony. "Follow me." We shall all be listening for it in the dying hour. "Follow me." Yea, Lord, if we only may, thou Singing Pathfinder, through clouds and space to the heavenly home.

VASSAL STATES BREAK FROM TURKEY

SURPRISING most of the older States of Europe, a new kingdom has appeared upon the map, where but recently there was only a principality under the nominal suzerainty of Turkey. Bulgaria has become a completely independent State, and, amid the rejoicing of the people, Prince Ferdinand has declared himself Czar of the Bulgarians. For years Bulgaria has been really independent with a ruler and parliament of its own, but it still owed, though unwillingly, a certain allegiance to the Sultan. To throw off this allegiance has been the desire of the Prince and people, and they have watched and waited and prepared to make their independence absolute whenever Turkey might find herself in difficulties, and they could strike with a fair prospect of success. As one diplomat put it, "Bulgaria has been preparing in a military way for at least ten years." Now, with the undoubted backing of the great dual monarchy of Austria-Hungary, they have taken the step which, while it will accomplish what the Bulgarians wish for, will at the same time disturb the European concert. The act of Bulgaria, however, has not caused so much chagrin to Turkey as the annexation of the provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary immediately after it.

Bulgarian Artillery Guarding the Frontier

Prince Ferdinand sent a telegraphic dispatch addressed to the Sultan in which he said that the popular will forced him to declare the independence of Bulgaria, and ended by expressing the wish that the relations between the kingdom of Bulgaria and the Ottoman Empire would remain as cordial as heretofore. While the dispatch must have been a great surprise to the Sultan, both he and his ministers acted with great moderation. The Sultan sent the news to his Grand Vizier, Kiamil Pasha, who at once summoned a meeting of the Council of State. It is said there were also present at the conference a committee representing the Young Turk Party, which caused the recent revolt resulting in the present constitution. After deliberating some time it was decided that Turkey could not accept Bulgaria's declaration of independence.

The second blow at the prestige of Turkey came with even less warning than the declaration of Bulgaria. Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary, announced the annexation of the two provinces of Herzegovina and Bosnia. These two provinces have been occupied by Austrian troops for the last thirty years and their civil affairs have also been administered by Austrian officials appointed from Vienna. Although this occupation was reliance of the people on agriculture, and since the Austrians hold of the reins of government this has steadily advanced. Bosnia and Herzegovina connected by a line railway opened in 1908. The people are practically all of Serbian blood though there are a few Gypsies in the country. They are about equally divided among the Mohammedan, Greek and Roman faiths. The provinces have played an unimportant part in history. They belong in turn to Illyria, Pannonia and Dalmatia. Serbia hoped that the provinces would come under her sway, as the people are of the same blood and were for a time part of the old Servian kingdom.

For a while they had their native kings, but in 1493 the Turks, led by Sultan Mohammed II, swept over the country with fire and steel. The spirit of the people remained unbroken; they clung to their faith and rose against their Turkish masters. One desperate encounter followed another until in 1878 the Congress of Berlin allowed Austria to hold the country with the Sultan as suzerain. It is a picturesque land with a quaint people, who are but little known to the average tourist. Ancient styles of dress greet the eye at every turn, while watchtowers set against the sky and feudal fortresses speak eloquently of a stormy past.

The first the Powers knew about the intention of Austria to absorb the two States was when the Austrian ambassadors called on the respective rulers of the different countries and presented an autograph note from the Emperor informing them of his intention. Probably not for years have the foreign offices of Europe been thrown into such a state of excitement. Every nation felt, for the time being at least, that perhaps some of the others were privy to the designs of Austria and Bulgaria, and were perhaps aiding them in order to carry out plans of their own. There was enough fear of a European war to cause the stocks to fall rapidly on every bourse in Europe. Business, for a while at least, was very uncertain as to the prospect for peace. Turkey at once sent to the Powers declaring that they should take measures to protect Turkey against the acts of Bulgaria and Austria, and calling on them to enforce the provisions of the treaty of Berlin.

Great Britain, Russia and France wish a meeting of the Powers to consider the situation.

Bulgaria has a population of over four millions and she could, at a few days' notice, have an army of 150,000 men ready to pour over the Turkish frontier. The Turks are greater in numbers, but their army is rated, even by Turks themselves, as lower in efficiency. Bulgaria's army is one of the best drilled and prepared of its size in Europe. The people take great pride in it and sacrifice in other things to keep its high standard.

Servia clamored for war against Austria. A mass meeting of 10,000 was held in Belgrade to protest against Austria's annexation of the two provinces. All of the army reserves of the first class, 120,000 men, have been called to the colors. The newspapers are filled with fiery articles; shops are closed, and nothing but demand for an immediate attack on Austria is heard.

Bulgaria's declaration spread like wildfire through the vassal lands of Turkey. The Cretans declared themselves a part of the Greek kingdom, and every house in Canea put out a Greek flag. The mayors of the towns delivered speeches and the people flocked into Canea firing rifles and pistols. All were anxious to join with the old fatherland, Greece. Probably the Cretans are as pure-blooded Greeks as can be found. There are 300,000 Christians and 30,000 Mussulmans on the island. The Powers intervened in 1898 to preserve order and made Crete an autonomous State. Since 1906 the king of Greece has appointed the commissioner. The day of the Cretan declaration the fiery populace of Montenegro declared that they, too, would acknowledge no longer the overlordship of the Turk, but would hold free their mountain fastnesses under their native prince. Before this strikes the eye of the reader war may be on, or Turkey may make the best of a bad situation.

those from sovereign States. This caused great indignation at Sofia. The Turks, on the other hand, say that the invitation was withheld at Germany's request.

Then came the trouble over the Oriental Railway. It has 186 miles of track in Bulgaria, and much more in Turkey. A strike on the Turkish section spread into Bulgaria. On an arrangement with the road officials, Bulgaria began to run the road, as the strike threatened the peace of the country. Turkey said she owned the line, and ordered Bulgaria to give it up, which the latter refused to do. Friction increased and Prince Ferdinand and his ministers decided to fix, once for all, the relations between Bulgaria and Turkey. The Prince went to Tirnova, the ancient capital, where in centuries past the warlike sovereigns of the Bulgarians have assumed the crown. His wife, the Princess Eleonore, and his children went on a special train to be with him at the ceremony that all expected. The royal party, and as many people as could be admitted, assembled in the historic church of the Forty Martyrs, which was built in 1230 to commemorate the victory over the Greeks by Czar Johann Scheschman. The declaration of independence was first read and then the President of the Parliament and the Prime Minister asked the Prince to become Czar of the Bulgarians. The Prince gave his assent, and a great cry of "Long live the Czar of the Bulgarians" resounded through the church and was taken up by the crowds outside. The wildest enthusiasm prevailed. A Te Deum was sung in the church; the king reviewed the troops, and the people gave themselves up to merrymaking. The city was illuminated in the evening; bands played up and down the streets, and the people danced for joy in the public squares. "Long live the Czar of the Bulgarians!" they cried. Bulgaria was free.

FOUNDERS' WEEK IN PHILADELPHIA

Governor Stuart of Pennsylvania

The Governor and Staff and the City Troop Entering Christ Church

One of the Heralds

WILLIAM PENN'S statue on the very tip of the dome of the Philadelphia City Hall must have gazed down in astonishment into the streets below during the first days of October to see the usually quiet citizens of the City of "Brotherly Love" celebrate "Founders' Week." It was the two hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Philadelphia, and the city had been preparing for the event for over a year past.

How well the ninety or more committees, composed of over six hundred business men, who had charge of the plans for the festivities, did their work is attested by the hundreds of thousands of pleased sightseers who thronged the streets to watch the passage of the various parades, view the elaborate decorations and illuminations and have some share in the spirit of carnival which seemed to permeate the very air. The city spent over $100,000 on the celebration and the National government did its share by sending regular troops and marines to take part in the parades while battleships were anchored off the city. The amount spent by private individuals is beyond calculation.

As a fitting opening for the week, special services were held in the churches on Sunday, which were attended by high officials and prominent guests from home and abroad. The Governor went to old Christ church and sat during the service in the same pew that was occupied by Washington when he lived in Philadelphia. Governor Stuart was attended by the famous City Troop of Philadelphia as a guard of honor, one of the most brilliantly uniformed bodies of men in the country. In fact, it is said that you have not seen Philadelphia until you have seen the troopers. They wear a uniform that makes one think of the days of Napoleon, with their wallow-tailed riding-coats, and helmets with a towering crest curved over the top in classic style. A service was held in the old Swedes Church, which was built in 1700. The service was attended by the Mayor of the city and other municipal officials. Much of the ritual used for the day was the same as in Colonial days, when Philadelphia was a small town, with little thought of ever becoming the prosperous city of the present.

One of the things that attracted interest during the week was the historic Industries Loan Exhibit held in the council chambers and hallways of the City Hall. It showed the progress of the industries and trades of Philadelphia from the days of the first settlers to 1908. There could be seen Franklin's electrical and friction machines, the scales used by David Rittenhouse as first director of the United States Mint, and the model of the Franklin stove.

One corridor was devoted to an exhibit of brass and silverware, and articles in pewter. There was enough to stock an old-time inn. The silver plate of the Wharton family of Wharton Grove had a case to itself. It was at Wharton Grove that the famous Meschianza was held in the Revolution by the British officers, the plans for which were made by the ill-fated Major Andre. The Wister family loaned two large wooden figures of a grenadier and a Turk which were carved and painted by Andre, who seems to have spent much time in drawing, carving and painting. There were numerous specimens of agricultural implements dating back before 1800—instruments so primitive as to cause the modern farmer who possesses up-to-date tools to stare in amazement. The women visitors were intensely interested in the collection of ancient costumes, not copies but the very suits and dresses worn of old by the members of the Moravians, Mennonites, Amish, Dunkards, the Friends and other sects. There were fine specimens of early American china made near Philadelphia, and other objects which it would take days to see.

Monday morning eight heralds, dressed in the costume of the Middle Ages and carrying long trumpets, rode about the city and at prominent points, after blowing a stirring fanfare, announced that the festivities of "Founders' Week" had begun. Later came the great military parade, in which Governor Stuart himself took part as commander-in-chief of the Pennsylvania troops. He made a striking figure on horseback. Major-General Frederick Dent Grant led the first division of regular troops. Behind him, however, rode the City Troop, as a guard of honor. Then came infantry, and artillery from the forts within a hundred miles or more of Philadelphia, the heavy artillerymen marching as infantry. Captain Reynolds of the United States cruiser Montana headed nineteen hundred sailors, who marched well despite the proverbial sea legs of the blue jackets. These were all landed from the ships sent by the government to take part in the celebration. Then came five hundred of the marine corps, making a brilliant bit of color after the sombre garb of the man-of-war's men. The second division was led by Governor Stuart, surrounded by a brilliant staff. The division comprised in three brigades that fine body of men, the Pennsylvania National Guard. It numbered ten thousand, who showed well why they are ranked among the best of our volunteer forces. During the day several historical tablets were unveiled, one in memory of the French soldiers who were camped in Philadelphia during the Revolution. It was unveiled by the Viscount de Chambrun, acting in behalf of the French Ambassador. Monday evening the city was a blaze of lights, and the illumination was repeated every evening thereafter through the week. Several hundred thousand electric bulbs illuminated the City Hall, on the front of which was a portrait of William Penn. An historical pageant was given in the open air on Franklin Field, and in tableaux were shown many incidents in the life of Penn and in the history of the city.

Tuesday was Firemen's and Policemen's Day. Each department had a parade that was of educational value. Bodies of men were dressed and equipped to show the progress of both organizations from the earliest days. Out-of-town organizations helped to swell the columns to several thousand. The German societies laid the cornerstone of the new Pastorius monument to commemorate the founding by Pastorius of Germantown in 1683. The ceremonies were very impressive and delegates from nearly every State in the Union were present. In the evening a great German meeting was held in one of the largest halls.

Wednesday was Industrial Day, and the parade had over two hundred floats showing the different trades of Philadelphia. Over ten thousand men were in line, who showed in historical order the conditions and time at which the various industries were started in the city. Thursday was Children's and Naval Day. The school children visited the historic places of the city and assembled at eleven o'clock for patriotic exercises at Independence Hall. Later there was a naval review on the Delaware, and over five hundred vessels of various sizes from a small sloop to a cruiser took part in it. By this time the sightseer was in a state of bewilderment as he tried to get about to see everything, for while the water pageant was on there was a parade of fifteen thousand Red Men. Fifty real members of the Lenni Lenape tribe, which made the treaty with Penn, marched with their white but painted brethren.

Visitors thought by this time that everything possible had been done, but Friday was the greatest day of all. It was Historical Day, and the floats and the costumes worn by the participants were probably the finest ever seen on the American continent. Five floats showed events in the life of Penn. There was the striking picture of the settlement of the Swedes, Franklin flying his kite, the visit of de Lafayette, the adoption of the Constitution, and many others. The pageant was designed by Miss Violet Oakley Hall, who painted the mural decorations for the State Capitol.

Saturday night the heralds again assembled before the City Hall. The trumpets were blown, the lights went out as one, and "Founders' Week" was over.

The Tuberculosis Campaign

SUMMED up as briefly as possible, the results of the recent Congress on Tuberculosis, at which thirty nations were represented, were these:

Resolutions recommending the obligatory notification and registration of all cases of tuberculosis; urging legislation for the regulation of factories and workshops; recommending the abolition of premature and injurious labor of women and children; favoring sanitary dwellings with a special view to resist ravages of tuberculosis and other diseases; urging instruction of school teachers in personal and school hygiene; recommending hospitals for treating advanced cases of tuberculosis, sanatoria for curing cases, and dispensaries and day and night camps for such cases as cannot be sent to hospitals and sanatoria.

These practical recommendations by the Congress, however, were overshadowed in importance for the moment by a resolution in which the delegates unanimously took issue with Dr. Robert Koch, the eminent German scientist, on the question of the danger of human infection from tuberculous cattle. Dr. Koch had placed himself on record as discrediting the danger and practically holding that infection from cattle was not transmissible. His view had no supporters in the Congress, for the resolution adopted declares that bovine infection is not only possible, but should be guarded against by the strongest preventive measures.

One of the most notable addresses was that of Professor Irving Fisher, of Yale, who asserted that "consumption costs the people of the United States more than a billion dollars a year." The professor, who is an authority on questions of public health, explained that 138,000 persons died annually of consumption. Estimating the cost of medical attendance, and the loss of earnings before death, and adding the money that might have been earned with health, he places the total loss on each case at an average of $8,000. This is probably excessive, but the figures, even if greatly modified, are still sufficiently startling.

From the humane as well as the economic standpoint, the recommendations of the Congress deserve to be carried out faithfully and promptly. They constitute the last word of science on the "Great White Plague" and the most approved methods of fighting it with reasonable hopes of success.

The War Cloud in the Balkans

EVER since the year 1878, when the famous treaty of Berlin was ratified by the great Powers, there has been a working agreement to regulate the relations between Turkey and the rest of Europe. Several times the treaty's provisions have been strained, but, as a whole, it has been respected as a guide in a troublesome situation. A large part of the difficulties in which Turkey has found itself is the fact that it held under its rule races in Europe that were antagonistic in every way to the Turk. The question of religion naturally played no small part. Gradually the Balkan States have achieved semi-independence under rulers of their own, but the Mussulman was still over-lord.

Bulgaria has now declared complete independence and several other States have broken their relations with Turkey as a result. Bulgaria probably did not take the step without consulting one or more of the great European nations, Austria first of all, without doubt. What part Germany has played still remains hidden. There is a general belief that she urged Austria, as they are strong allies, to act, and the latter encouraged Bulgaria in order to break up the present amicable relations between several Powers who have shown an inclination to isolate Germany. The Turks certainly feel that Germany must have had some knowledge of the move of Bulgaria and Austria. It is thought that Turkey's neighbors wish to embarrass the country while she is endeavoring to get on a constitutional basis.

Undoubtedly, Bulgaria will retain her independence though a large number of Young Turks would like to fight to hold their suzerainty. Austria will probably hold the two provinces she has taken. While other countries say she has broken the Berlin treaty, Austria declares that all knew her occupation would be permanent when she marched into them in 1878. There is a call for a conference in which it seems as if Russia, England and France would stand together for peace. Several countries will demand favors at the cost of Turkey, if they assent to Austria's act. Italy will agree, for example, to Austria holding the two provinces, if Austria and the rest will raise no objection to Italy taking a port in Albania. Russia wants the Dardanelles opened. The question is, would not Turkey lose more by urging a conference than by letting things go as they are? Austria has the provinces, and, as one diplomat puts it, she would come to the conference with the provinces in her pocket.

At present Europe is in a state of uncertainty. A fire-brand country like Serbia might set all Europe in a blaze. All wait with a diplomatic smile upon their faces, but their hands upon their swords.

Cheap Ocean Postage

WHEN a "penny post" between England and the United States was first suggested several years ago, it was believed to be impracticable, and predictions were freely made that any experiment in that direction would result in a heavy loss. Now that the two countries have had an experience of several weeks of cheap ocean postage, it has been shown that the forecasters were wrong, the mails both ways having increased phenomenally. Many of the liners are carrying double the usual quantity of mail under the cheaper rates, and while there may be a decline after popular curiosity has been somewhat satisfied, Postmasters General Meyer and Buxton are looking forward to a permanent expansion which will soon make the business profitable to both countries. This may require a year or more, but meanwhile the new system is proving a valuable link in the chain of commercial and social relations that binds the two nations. Let us hope that France, Germany and other European countries may soon establish a two-cent postal rate. There is no better or surer way of promoting mutual appreciation and international good feeling than by the introduction of cheap postage.

The Antiquity of Man

PAGE by page, science is reverently unfolding the great book of nature. At every successive stage, we are confronted with new evidences of the great antiquity of the human race and of the existence of man in periods of such vast remoteness that even the oldest written history seems modern in comparison with that which is unrecorded.

Professor Peuck, an American scientist who has been prosecuting his investigations in Europe for several years, is now returning to tell us of the wonderful discoveries of Dr. Ekehardt in the famous Weldekerchihohle or Cave at Santis, Switzerland. Within the farthest recesses of the cave, hitherto unexplored, were found evidences of human habitation. Bones of men of the earlier Stone Age (the pre-paleolithic period, roughly estimated by scientists as 100,000 years ago) were unearthed side by side with the bones of bears that had been killed for food. These remains were reminders of the inhabitants of those mountains at a time before the great glacial wave had ground the faces of the mountains and given to the Alps their present conformation.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and earth." As knowledge advances, we realize more and more the significance of that simple yet profound statement in the Divine Word. Every discovery of science is as a new light shining into darkness that obscures the beginnings of human history. At each successive stage, wherever man is found, he is a sentient, reasoning being, with characteristics of his kind, no matter how primitive his surroundings. There is little encouragement to the evolutionist in these investigations. There is no material break in the continuous line between the lowest savagery and the highest civilization; the distance between the lowest type of man and the highest lower animal is immeasurable.

The Palace of Corn

HERE is a great agricultural fair being held at Mitchell, S. D. One of the most striking features of the exposition is the large main building, which is made of corn. The architecture is entirely and the decorations of various colored corn are beautiful. Corn is the king that inhabits this place. In this republic of ours, there are a number of monarchs: Kings Corn, Pork, Steel, etc., are very potent. King Corn has a mighty empire and a powerful hand. He planted millions of acres of corn last spring and has brought russet brown stalks and ears to a most bountiful harvest, and with his hand, measure out pretty nearly two million bushels of his product. He has a very benevolent function also and lives very largely for the health and usefulness of his subjects, furnishing them food for the hard work and duties of life. The ice palaces of the north, with their crystalline purity and their jeweled angles, are magnificent as homes of the North Wind, but there seems to be a peculiar fitness in the farmers building their palace out of ears and paying their tribute to the royalty of King Corn. And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea. (Gen. 41:49.)

Coosier Fight Against the Saloon

The fight for local option by the county as a unit, which has been going on in the State of Indiana for many months, has attracted the attention of the whole nation. Governor recently called a special session of the Indiana legislature to settle that temperance contest. The liquor and temperance forces of the State not only, but also of the Union, took an active part in it. The Senate passed the bill by a substantial majority, and the House, on September 26, in a magical struggle, passed the bill by a vote of 55 to 45, six Democrats voting for and four Republicans against the bill. While the roll was being called, Mr. Johnson, a representative from Vigo County, arose to explain his vote. He said: "I am not in favor of this bill. I was elected on a platform in opposition to it. I could not vote for it; but I have been pressed by influences more powerful than those of party politics, so that I have been scarcely able to eat or sleep." And, with tears in his eyes, he voted "yes," and sank down in his chair, and his daughter threw her arms about his neck and kissed him, while he wept still more violently, and while hundreds of temperance people, who had gathered in the State House, cheered and cried. Under the new law, in addition to the working of the old law, the saloon will within a year be banished from eight-tenths of all the geographical territory and two-thirds of the population of the State of Indiana.

Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good. (Rom. 12:9.)

A Champion Life-Saver

Professor John F. Conroy, who has acted as a life-guard at Manchester, Mass., holds the world's record as a life-saver. He recently made his 133d rescue, saving a ten-year-old Pittsburg boy from the surf at the greatest risk to himself. He was exhausted after a fight for an hour with the undertow and the surf. The boy had gotten an eighth of a mile from land before the professor reached him. The rescuer reached the line of the breakers just as his strength was giving way; but a life-line was hoisted over his head, which he made fast, and he was hauled through the undertow, still clinging to the boy. Hundreds of people on shore applauded the heroic rescue of the professor. It is important to save the bodies of men, but it is a still more important thing to save their souls. Most nations have bestowed a reward upon the one who saves a human life—ininitely greater will be the reward of those who rescue their fellow men from spiritual death.

He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death. (James 5:20.)

The Skeleton and the Money Bag

The latest excavations at Pompeii have led to interesting discoveries. A recent exploration revealed a well-preserved tomb, erected in memory of the wife of a magistrate, who had died at the age of twenty-two. It consisted of a marble column, surmounted by an amphora and surrounded by a circular seat. Close to the tomb a skeleton was found clutching a bag, containing fifty silver coins

It had been dying for five years. Several unsuccessful attempts were made to save it by filling the decayed places with paraffin, and it was found necessary to remove it. The acorn from which the tree grew was brought by the Prince of Wales from England.

What a beauty to the earth and a blessing to man, is a tree! Some trees are food-bearing and others make timber for houses and ships and the arts of industry. Unfortunately this tree was located badly for a century life. It was where the feet of too many people tramped the ground. There was a beautiful sentiment in planting an oak tree in the park of our metropolis, and it ought to have had a better chance for its life. But concrete, and stone pavements, and the heavy foot-falls of the crowd, and the electric wires, and the conveniences of our civilization, are not very friendly to the lives of trees. Congested populations and our strenuous civilization are not more friendly to our physical life than to that of the forest trees. Our great blessings must have their perils with them. If the tree had lived a hundred or a thousand years, some man with an axe would then have had to chop it down, for the caterpillars would have killed the leaves and the insects would have eaten into the bark and killed the sap.

So death cuts down everything physical that lives.

Hew ye down trees. (Jer. 6:6.)

Records His Death Experience

Dr. J. J. Blair, a wealthy and influential physician of Cincinnati, committed suicide by drinking cyanide of potassium. He sat at his desk and wrote a description of his sensations. He recorded the phenomena of dying as long as he could direct his pen. It was evident from the memoranda found by his young wife, shortly after she discovered his body, that the physician to the last was interested keenly in what, perhaps, he regarded as his last great experiment. The point of greatest interest is, that in his last moments he seemed to experience proof of an after life. Instead of recording that he felt darkness descending upon him, as might be expected of purely physical sensation, he wrote as though his real self was quitting the body. "I feel the soul fleeing," was the last sentence; and then there was a blur on the paper, indicating that it had fled. The pen with which Dr. Blair wrote the story of his death was still in his hand when his wife found him.

Some persons insist that if his sensations had been merely the approaching cessation of his material life, he would have written: "I feel the end coming," or simply "I am dying," but that what he did write indicated that his soul was flying away into another life. It is the intention of several of his friends to send a report of the case to the American Society for Psychic Research, in the belief that it will be regarded as a valuable addition to the data of the search for spiritual experiences.

The self-destruction of Dr. Blair was pitiable. His experience may have been the consciousness of the soul's going out of the body into another realm, or it may have been a vision of his imagination, caused by the drug he took. How different would it have been if he had had faith in Christ and that consciousness of the divine presence which has given peace and victory and gorgeous visions of the better life to millions and millions of believers through all the ages!

After this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven. (Rev. 4:1.)

of the consular and imperial periods. It was apparently the skeleton of a person who was overwhelmed by the ashes of the volcano while trying to escape with his money. This poor man was not the only one who undertook to carry his gold through the gateway of death. It hurts many men to make a will. So happy are they in handling their own money and in increasing its volume, that they would gladly take it along with them to the other side if they could; but the soul has to leave all its baggage on this side of the river.

For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. (I. Tim. 6:7.)

Tree King Edward Planted Dies

The big English oak known as the Prince of Wales Tree, which grew from an acorn planted in the Mall in Central Park, New York, in 1861, by the then Prince of Wales, now King Edward VII., was cut down by a Central Park workman recently. The stump was pulled out and the spot covered with sod.

HOW TO PASTEURIZE MILK AT HOME

AMONG the exhibits at the International Congress on Tuberculosis at Washington was the working model of Nathan Straus's method of fighting the great white plague in New York City. Other exhibits showed by charts and photographs the dreadful extent of the scourge, ways in which the infection is spread and precautions to be observed. There were models of sanatoria and of numerous devices for the alleviation of the sufferings of consumptives. But Mr. Straus showed how humanity can strike at the root of the disease, as he has done for the past sixteen years, by killing the germs of tuberculosis in cows' milk. The process by which this is done is pasteurization, or the heating of the milk to 157 degrees, which destroys the tubercle bacilli, and at the same time kills the germs of typhoid, diphtheria, and scarlet fever, while it in no way affects the taste or digestibility of the milk so purified.

The automatic bottle filler consists of a tank, into which the milk is filtered through a sieve lined with cheesecloth and cotton. A metal basket or tray containing the nursing-bottles slides in under the tank, a lever presses a nozzle into each bottle, starting the flow of milk, which is cut off automatically as soon as the bottles are filled. Then the tray slides out on a track and corks are set lightly in the necks of the bottles, so as to allow the escape of steam generated during pasteurization. The trays then pass into the pasteurizer, where the milk is heated to 157 degrees. From the time that temperature is reached, the milk remains in the oven for twenty minutes, the temperature being kept automatically at that point. This is the pasteurization process now used in most hospitals. When the milk has had the requisite heating, the trays are taken out of the oven, the corks or stoppers are pressed down tightly, and the trays are set in the cooler, where the temperature is lowered rapidly, first by a spray of cold water and then by a flooding of the cooler. Then the milk is put in the refrigerators, where the temperature is lowered to 40 degrees.

Using the Home Pasteurizer

Capping the Bottles

Treated according to this method, milk ceases to be the means of conveying tuberculosis from the cow to the human being, and it is for this reason that the Nathan Straus exhibit attracted such wide attention at the Tuberculosis Congress and received the express commendation of nearly every scientist who attended that gathering.

But pasteurized milk is not yet within the reach of all and consequently the mother who wishes to save her babies from the milk-borne diseases is under necessity to pasteurize the milk herself. To enable any mother to do this, Mr. Straus has invented a Home Pasteurizer, which any tinsmith has liberty to copy and which can be made for a dollar.

In this the milk obtained from the milkman can be made safe. The Home Pasteurizer is simply a kettle which can be set on a table or floor. The milk is put in nursing bottles, which are set in a holder made to fit inside the kettle. The corks are set in the bottles lightly. The kettle is filled with boiling water up to the level of the supports on the inside of the kettle. The holder is set on these supports and the cover is put on. In five minutes the steam from the boiling water is allowed to gradually warm up the bottles. Then the cover is removed and the kettle holder is turned so as to tilt the supports and let down to the bottom of the kettle, so as to immerse the bottles to the neck. Again the cover is put on and the milk is allowed to remain twenty-five minutes in the water, which accomplishes the pasteurization of the milk. Then the holder is lifted out of the water, the corks are pressed down tightly, the bottles are cooled rapidly with water and put on the ice, and the mother has a day's supply of perfectly safe disease-free milk for her baby, and can feel sure that she is not infecting the infant with tuberculosis. The Straus contrivance is so simple that any mother can use it and thus avert danger of infection.

THE SWEEP OF THE FOREST FIRES

NOT for many years, perhaps a century, has there been such a series of forest fires as have been sweeping for weeks over North America. The Northern States east of the Mississippi have been, with the Dominion of Canada, the worst sufferers. In New York State, the Adirondacks have been burned for weeks, and mountain after mountain in the Catskills has been enveloped in flame and smoke. The New England forests have been on fire in various places, while around the Great Lakes, especially in the Lake Superior region, many acres are now covered with charred stumps where formerly were beautiful stretches of timber. Canada was covered with a great pall of smoke which stretched with but few breaks from the province of Quebec on the east to Vancouver on the Pacific Coast. Generations of forest growth have gone, involving untold financial loss; two generations will not replace the woods, even though both nature and man are favorable to reforestation.

The past summer was one of unusual dryness, and in August there were but few showers, and the underbrush grew so dry even in the deepest groves that it made a continuous crackling beneath the heels of hunter and woodchopper and tourist. So dry in fact was the undergrowth that it is possible that many of the fires may have started from spontaneous combustion. In the majority of cases, however, the fires were started through the carelessness of campers, or from sparks from the engines of trains passing through the large belts of parched woodland. The heat became so intense between Horseshoe and Nahasane that the Mohawk trains running from the Mohawk River up on the local division of the New York Central toward Canada could not get through. The forest on both sides of the track was a sea of flame; in places the ties had been reduced to ashes and the steel rails were twisted into grotesque and snake-like shapes. The railroad company tried to get repair squads through to repair the damage, but after they had gone some distance they had to turn back. They had to give up as the air grew so hot that no one could breathe it.

The smoke drifted southward from the burning Laurentians in the province of Quebec, was reinforced by the smoke from the Adirondacks and the Catskills, and made a blue haze over the Atlantic seacoast. Over New York Bay the smoke mixed with a light fog, which held it stationary and made a dense cloud which interfered most seriously with navigation. The giant Cunard steamship Mauretania from Liverpool got up as far as the lightship at Sandy Hook, guided by the tolling of the lightship's submarine bell. The smoke and fog were growing thicker and the captain did not dare to try for the channel, responsible as he was for a seven-million-dollar ship and cargo, so he anchored. It was twenty-four hours later when the great hull was descried looming up toward her dock on the North River. From the sky-scraping office buildings of Manhattan, the sun for several days could be looked at without a dark glass. It was but a small, dull red disk in the floating murk.

The rain which fell on the 28th of September helped to stay the ravages of the flames in New York State. The day before it came the authorities acknowledged that the fires in the Adirondack Mountains were beyond their control and that only a rainstorm could save the woods and many villages. The people of the village of Beaver River Station thought that their village would go and that they would be fortunate to escape with their lives and part of their portable property. The flames came on relentlessly until they were but five or six hundred feet from the station. Then the wind died down suddenly as if puffed away. Then the fire-fighters, who had been greatly discouraged and were almost worn out with their long and seemingly fruitless exertions, rushed to their work with renewed hope and the place was saved. The forests between Horseshoe and Lake West went up in great sheets and billows of flame that held the spectators spell-bound with their fearful beauty. It was reported that a number of people had perished in the fires in this region. It will probably be a long time before the fate of some families who lived in isolated spots in the forests will be known.

The State Superintendent of Forests for a while directed the various operations of the fire-fighters throughout the State from the main office at Albany. At last, however, the situation was so desperate that he went into the mountains and took personal charge of the Adirondack operations, making his headquarters at Saranac. There he managed to keep the fires under control, and large squads of forest fire wardens and volunteers were posted through the district between Saranac and Lake Placid, and by the most strenuous exertions held the flames at bay. The special preserve of the State near Chubb Hill, where young pines are grown, was saved by the chief fire warden and his men. They could get little water, so they had to dig trenches. The trench system of defense was used to check the great fires at Ava and Fullerville. The trenches in most cases were but two feet wide, and the men would push the burning brush into them to stop the progress of the flames. Even when water was obtainable and the flames were apparently under control it was found in hundreds of cases that the fire would creep along beneath the surface of intermingled dead leaves and brush, and suddenly break out with a roar around some giant tree of the forest, many feet beyond the supposed danger line. Quite a number of wealthy men who own large tracts and preserves went into the burning districts and directed their own employees in their battle with the flames.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—EVANGELIST W. R. LANE, who recently visited this country, is now conducting a series of successful Gospel meetings in England and Wales. He writes: "I am thankful to say we are seeing signs of the saving power of the Gospel."

—PRESIDENT VAYHINGER, of Taylor University, Upland, Ind., writes that a spiritual revival has taken place among the students, and a number have made open confession of Christ.

The teachers are praying that every student in the college may become a Christian.

—NATIVE MISSIONARY helpers are needed at Nickerie, Surinam, Dutch Guiana. The support of such a worker requires about $240 a year. Nickerie is on the border of British and Dutch Guiana. It is a most needy missionary field. Any reader desiring to undertake the support, either in whole or partially, should write to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—THE NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR organization of China has appointed Rev. and Mrs. Edgar E. Strother, of St. Louis, Mo., to the responsible office of General Secretary to the Christian Endeavor Union of that empire. Mr. and Mrs. Strother write asking for the prayers of our readers for the success of their work.

—MISSIONARY G. H. MALONE and Mrs. Malone, of the American Advent Mission, Nan-King,

China, are now in this country on furlough. Mr. Malone writes us: "At present it is within the power of nearly every missionary to reach with the Gospel all classes and conditions of men in China. Gigantic opportunities are offered the church in that land. Shall we improve her God-given opportunities? The little cast-off waifs without parents or homes in China need the Christ who, when on earth, blessed little children."

On Recreation

OUR great host of young people, who a little while ago were children, are very properly reluctant to forego social enjoyments and to do without entertainments. Both mind and body in their case require recreation fully as much as they require sleep. The question reiterated in letters from young people and from their parents varies in form, but not in substance. "Is it right for one who wishes to set a good example and to lead a Christian life to play cards, to dance, to go to the theatre, or to opera, or to engage in any worldly amusement?" This puts the matter at issue squarely before those who are conscientious and sincere in their desire to avoid every doubtful diversion, and to walk in the straight and narrow path of self-denial.

There is no difficulty whatever in answering this question on broad lines. First, you and I know perfectly that it is dangerous to fight against one's convictions and wrong to tamper with conscience. A safe rule for one's own following is never to engage in a pastime or visit a place concerning which one is in doubt. Equally, one should be careful not to criticize others, or unfairly bar the door of their freedom by personal scruples. Take cards for example: The chief interest they offer to the majority of players is in the hazard of winning or losing a game. On this hazard, money is staked and, whether the amount be large or small, the end in view is the same. The element of gambling enters into the amusement and the gambler's consuming passion is awakened.

Bridge whist, a game that has been popular in society for some years, has been the means of wrecking hearts and homes, and has fostered, in women more generally than in men, a tendency to idleness and dissipation. In our cities it has invaded daylight hours that should have been given to other uses, and, in a few circles, it has intruded upon the sacredness of the Sabbath evening. If it were possible to use cards simply as a mental refreshment, with gambling wholly eliminated, they might become harmless bits of pasteboard.

There are numerous games of cards, historical, artistic, clever games of authors, and games of pure fun, as pleasing to grown people as to boys and girls. These help in evening around the hearth to pass very pleasantly. Guard against prejudice and tradition in this special amusement, and still more decidedly guard against gambling, and you will be on the right side. Here let me add that, whatever games are played in the home, there should be no deceit, concealment, evasion or stealth about them. Amusements that lurk in the dark are full of peril.

There are churches that condemn certain forms of popular amusement; still, in these days greater liberty is allowed than formerly, even in the churches that most rigidly insisted on entire opposition. At no time all works of fiction were condemned by many Christians, and it was thought a sinful waste of precious time to read even the best of them. We ought to be broad enough to discriminate between productions that are coarse and vulgar, appealing to the baser passions, and those that furnish object lessons in goodness and unselfishness.

There are many delightful, yet harmless, ways of spending winter evenings, many games in which young people and children may engage, and many opportunities for cultivating the social side of our nature. Charades afford opportunity for the cleverness and wit of the family and the neighborhood to display themselves. Tableaux, illustrated proverbs and the like may form the basis for an agreeable evening when young people come together. In succeeding issues we shall give a good deal of space to our readers, most of whom have conclusions of their own on this important subject. This week we give space to a thoughtful letter from a reader of this page.

Moderation in Amusement

Being a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and noting that as such we are invited to send the same our ideas in regard to legitimate amusements, I just wish to say that I do not think it so much the amusement itself to which we should object as the manner in which it is conducted. There are some kinds that in themselves are very questionable and in which no one who professes to be a Christian should indulge. A game of

A FLOWER-VENDER IN JAPAN

Who'll buy my flowers? The fragrant wares
That tempt the purse in old Japan,
To Eden's perfect blooms are heirs,
The sweetest ever shown to man.

Who'll buy my flowers? In summer hours
They grew in sunshine and in dew.
Across the sea you come to me
To buy the flowers I've culled for you.

authors or flinch at one's home for pastime and amusement among ourselves and our friends is in our judgment in perfect harmony with Christianity if not indulged in to an intemperate degree. But should we allow games or other amusements to so occupy our time as to cause us in any way to neglect our Christian duties, or temporal or business affairs, then we are doing wrong. To engage in any kind of game for a prize, or for "he pays who loses" is simply engaging in a form of gambling.

It has been the experience of the church that the billiard and pool-room have been a great detriment to it, keeping many young men from attending mid-week prayer meeting, and other church services, as well as sometimes alienating them entirely from the church.

With regard to the ball-room, I believe it should be denounced, as a thing of evil, by all Christian people. It has been my experience that those who frequent the ball-room are of little use in the cause of Christ, while those who are doing the most good do not attend balls.

A personal friend of mine who had been solicited time and again to join the church, and who had been taught from early childhood that it is a sin to dance, and teaches the same to his family, positively refused to join because there were several in church, who take part in its services, who attend balls frequently. In such cases as this are not such standing in the way of others?

L. W. HEINLEIN.

Rights of the Absent

AN OLD adage to the effect that nothing but good should be spoken of the dead has been accepted by most of us as the final word on the subject. To cast reproach and contumely on those whose folded hands are weaponless, is a cowardly proceeding, of which decent people are ashamed. In a sense the absent are as defenseless as the dead. Whatever is said about them to their disadvantage may be said with impunity, if the speaker be malicious. Never to speak ill of anybody, present or absent, is a rule of good breeding. To indulge in harmful gossip, to repeat stories that should be suppressed, to insinuate more than one quite likes to say, to rake up a forgotten scandal in any way whatsoever, to throw a stone at one who is in South Africa, Nova Zembla, the next county or the house across the street, but in any case out of ear-shot, is to show one's self possessed of mean and contemptible qualities.

If one have stones to throw let him not throw them at his neighbors' back. We might go further than to brand ill-speaking of the absent to private folk whom we know, as low and unseemly. Defend free speech as we may, it frequently passes the limit of propriety so far as our public men are concerned.

The higher the altitude, the greater is the apparent temptation to hurl a missile at him who sits there. It is not of the least consequence who happens to be the President of these United States. Let his politics be what they may, he is certain of abuse on all sides. Suppose for an instant that a majority of the abusive had the chance of an invitation to a dinner in the White House, or an audience in the East Room, would they tell the President to his face what they never tire of repeating behind his back? Not they.

The Junior Band

It is time now for the junior band to reassemble. What are the children going to do in the coming season? If they are studying missionary subjects, their leader must select a field and assign topics to the different members. Sometimes they may travel with maps and photographs to the distant land where their missionary labors. Again they will have songs and recitations and very likely a letter or two from those whom they are supporting at the distant station. If they are working for our American Indians, as no doubt some of them are, they will learn what good qualities the Indian children have, and they will correct some false ideas about Indian fathers and mothers. There is much that is patient and noble in these lingering red men, and our Junior Bands ought to become better acquainted with them. They will not forget the contribution box. The money they give should be money they earn, and every penny, nickel and dime should be given with a generous heart and a prayer that it may do good. The leader of a Junior Band must possess energy and initiative and have something novel to present to her boys and girls from week to week, so that the meetings may not be dull. It is a good plan to give each member something to do, or something to care for, so that all share the interest.

Lesson No. 21

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS

La Dek Ordonoj*

CI DEVAS havi neniujn aliajn diojn krom mi.

2 Ci ne devas havi por ci ian gravuritan figuron aŭ ian portreton de io kio estas en la ĉielo supre, aŭ kio estas en la tero malsupre, aŭ kio estas en la akvo sub la tero. Ci ne devas terenfali antaŭ ili nek servi ilin: ĉar mi, Jehovo, ĉia Dio, estas ĵaluza Dio, punante la maljustecojn de la patroj sur la idojn ĝis la tria kaj kvara generacio de tiuj kiuj malamas min, kaj donante aman bonecon al miloj da tiuj kiuj amas min kaj obeas miajn ordonojn.

3 Ci ne devas paroli la nomon de Jehovo, ĉia Dio, vane, ĉar Jehovo ne juĝos lin senkulpan kiu parolas lian nomon vane.

4 Memoru la sabatan tagon por teni ĝin sanktan. Ses tagojn ci devas laboradi kaj fari cian tutan taskon; sed la sepa tago estas sabato al Jehovo ĉia Dio: en tiu ci ne devas fari ian laboron, ci, nek ĉia filo, nek ĉia filino, ĉia servisto, nek ĉia servistino, nek ĉia bestaro, nek la gasto kiu estas en ĉiaj pordegoj: ĉar en ses tagoj Jehovo kreis la ĉielon kaj la teron, la maron, kaj ĉion kio en ili estas, kaj ripozis la sepan tagon; tial Jehovo benis la sabatan tagon kaj sanktigis ĝin.

5 Honoru cian patron kaj cian patrinon, por ke ĉiaj tagoj povu longe daŭri en la lando kiun Jehovo ĉia Dio donas al vi.

6 Ci ne devas mortigi.

7 Ci ne devas adulti.

8 Ci ne devas ŝteli.

9 Ci ne devas doni malveran ateston kontraŭ ĉia najbaro.

10 Ci ne devas avidi la domon de ĉia najbaro. Ci ne devas avidi la edzinon de ĉia najbaro, nek lian serviston, nek lian servistinon, nek lian bovon, nek lian azenon, nek ion kio apartenas al ĉia najbaro.

Chautauqua Vespera Dioservo

These hymns were translated by Rev. A. Krafft for the Chautauqua Vesper Service which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD July 22, but had to be omitted on account of the lack of space. It is hoped that they will be frequently sung in connection with that service in all of the Esperanto clubs connected with us:

Vesperkanto

Mortas tag' en okcident';
Regas sur la ter' silent';
Jen, la nokt-kandelojn! Kor',
Donu nun al la Sinjor' Koradoron!

Horo:

Sankta, sankta, sankta Di' en ĉiel'!
Ĉion ajn plenigas Li;
Kun tutmondo laŭdu ni
La Sinjoron.

Ho, vivfont', kunligu nin,
Ĉiujn, kiuj serĉas Cin,
Ĉiujn sur la ter', kun Ci,
Kaj malfermu ja al ni
Ĉian koron!

Ombroj falas.—Dia kor',
Helpu do, ke tra la glori
De l' kaŝanta Cin stelari
Klare vidu la homar'
Ĉian gloron!

Kiam je la mondvesper'
Ĉio pasos sur la ter',
Ho, vidigu Ci al ni
La eternan tagon, Di'!
Al Ci gloron!

La Pano de Vivo

Vivpanon, ho Sinjor', Donu al mi!
Milojn ĉe l' bord' de l' mar'
Satigis Vi.
Mi, en la Sankta Skrib', Serĉas, Sinjor',
Vin, ĉar sopiras ja
Je Vi la kor'.

En Galilea Vi
Benis.—La ver'
Estu, Vivplena Vort',
Mia esper',
Por ke, libera de Pekoservut',
Goje honoru Vin
Mia salut'.

No Burdens Yonder

Copyright, 1906, by CHARLES M. ALEXANDER. International copyright secured.

No trials yonder, all the testing done,
The school-days over and the prizes won,
No much-tried faith, like gold in furnace heat,
The purifying will all be complete.

No toiling yonder, and no weariness,
No disappointments and no more distress,
The future bright, the past all understood,
We'll see that all the way He led was good.

No partings yonder, and no sad good-byes,
No pain, no sickness, and no weeping eyes,
But best of all my Saviour I shall see,
No cloud will come between my Lord and me.

THIS is one of the most beautiful of the hundreds of hymns Miss Ada Habershon, of London, England, has written. It contains a strain of comfort and hope which appeals to all. The music was written by Mr. Harkness. It is said by the evangelists' associates that recently in Philadelphia, as a lady lay dying, she had the words of this hymn read to her, and during the reading she passed over the line to the land of no burden nor sorrows, where "God shall wipe away all tears."

Rebellion of Absalom

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ALREADY sin far more terrible than his own sin had broken in David's family, and Absalom, son, had avenged the outrage upon sister, Tamar, by the death of his brother, Amnon, taking the law in his own hands, not from any desire for the honor of God, for he knew God, not from any abhorrence of as his after conduct shows us, but from his desire for revenge. How terrible it is when God humbles through our children, and shows us evil of our own hearts as it is transmitted to our children! Absalom, but David could not forget his wilful, selfish, wayward, his brother's murderer.

Nothing escaped Joab; he knew David through and through; and as Absalom had been three years taking refuge with his grandfather, Talmai king of Geshur, Joab employed "a woman" to invent and tell to the king a story which should touch his sensibilities and enable her to introduce the subject of Absalom. The end was that Absalom was recalled; but for three more years he did not see the king's face, for David must deny his own heart in his loyalty to God, who had the sin of Absalom. But Absalom was not slow to compass his own end and by setting Joab's field of battle on fire, he prevailed upon him to obtain an interview for him with the king.

But Absalom was an unchangeable man; self reigned in his heart, he lived for self and nothing else. He had gained his object in being restored to the favor of the king, his father, but instead of devoting himself to him out of loving gratitude, he made use of his position against him. He "prepared him chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him." In order to further his plans, he must make an appearance which would command the respect of the people; they must know him as the prince by the state which he kept up. But, joined with this, he made use of every art by which he could ingratiate himself with the people. He rose up early, and stood by the gate, on the watch for all who came to the king for judgment, and thus intercepting them on their way to the palace, he misrepresented his father's government. In this manner "Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel." All this time, David was unaware of what was going on, but God's Word was being fulfilled, there was evil to David in his own house. The plot was fully ripe for execution. Absalom went to Hebron, and "sent spies throughout all the tribes of Israel, saying, As soon as ye hear the sound of the trumpet, then ye shall say, Absalom reigneth in Hebron."

There came a messenger to break the news to David, and to tell him that the hearts of the men of Israel were after Absalom. It was sore news to David; he was proud of Absalom, his fine, beautiful son. The warrior king became feeble as a woman, he could not fight against his son, he had but one thought, and he told it to his servants: "Arise, and let us flee."

Very touching was the great love shown him by some of his followers. Six hundred former Philistines of Gath were among them. The priests and Levites, with Zadok the high priest at their head, carried the ark of God along with the company of those who fled, but the king had faith in his God, and said to Zadok the priest, "Carry back the ark of God into the city; if I shall find favor in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and shew me both it, and his habitation; but if he thus say, I have no delight in thee: behold, here I am, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Learning in the School of Christ*

A CHRISTIAN minister told an interested audience not long ago of his intimacy with a distinguished Jewish rabbi, and of the many things that he had learned from him.

"Rabbi ——— was always telling me," he said, "that we Christians do not know our Book—and he often put to me questions which I could not answer, regarding the meaning of common Scripture passages. For instance, he once said to me, 'What does mean in your Testament, where Jesus says, Where two or three are gathered together, there I will be in the midst of them?'"

"Why," I stammered, "it means just that, I suppose. There is no meeting too small. Jesus will be here even if only two or three are present."

"Ah," he said, shaking his head; "I was afraid you didn't know. This is what it means: The Jews cannot hold a meeting unless at least ten are present. It is a part of our religion. But here comes Jesus and says: 'You don't need to have ten to make a meeting. Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there I will be.'" And anyone can see how much significance is added to this familiar verse by this interpretation.

The numerous and beautiful admonitions in the book of Proverbs to seek for wisdom as for hidden treasure, and to love and exalt understanding, are so little heeded. It has even been said by some polished ones that a man's religion is harmed by too much education—as though our God were not the Lord of the mind as well as of the heart. A little learning is a dangerous thing. It is half-knowledge which kills. True and universal mind-culture will mark the millennium of God.

And the good rabbi was right when he said that we Christians do not know our Book. We do not study it enough, and when we do study it we do not use our best intelligence. It has been asserted by great scholars that anyone who will diligently work out a single day in each week to unravel the full significance in but a single chapter of the Bible, will in ten years have learned what would be the equivalent of a college education.

Law, theology, history, geography, language—even mathematics—would have to be more or less thoroughly mastered in taking any sort of a comprehensive course of Bible study. The great trouble is that we do not love to study, and hard thinking is not germane to the average mind.

It has been asserted by scoffers that we do not apply to the Bible even as much thought-power as we expend in other directions. Is it not sadly true of too many of us that we pay little attention to chapters which are read in church or at family prayers? Try, without warning them, to find how many who were present at such readings can tell off-hand a few hours afterward just what was read. The results are likely to be discouraging.

We must give our best faculties to the study of God's word; and we must remember that every bit of knowledge that we can get upon all high subjects is just so much more of armor for fighting the battles of the Lord.

"Wisdom is the principal thing"—and "with all thy getting, get understanding." And the Psalmist says: "A good understanding have all they that do his commandments."

But the wisdom of the head is, after all, but a poor thing compared with the wisdom of the heart, which can come only through the indwelling of the Spirit. Sometimes it comes as it came to the untaught but eloquent Jasper, whose sins seemed one night to be "piled up like mountains," but on whom "fore I knewed it," as he testified in his quaint vernacular many times in the presence of great congregations, "de mawnin' broke; I was light as a feather, an' salvation rolled like a flood through my soul."

It is not given to many in these latter days to so experience the descent of the Spirit. He comes often slowly as the flower unfolds; and oftenest in the home of faith and prayer, where parents long, with divine desire, that their children, in the dew of their youth, may put their hands in the Saviour's, and devote their lives to learning his wisdom.

The Tireless Watcher*

A VERY intellectual woman once said, "I believe God looks after the great things of life, but as for the little events of every day, I do not believe that he pays any attention to them."

And yet this lady was a microscopist of great skill. She knew better than most of us what a wonderful world is hidden away in minute forms which defy the search of the naked eye of man. She called herself a Christian—but her God was really only half-a-God.

"The hairs of our head are all numbered, and a sparrow shall not fall to the ground without our Father," a friend reminded her.

"Oh, that is only one of those queer Oriental figures of speech."

"Just that," rejoined her friend; "a figure which means that God sees and controls even the most apparently insignificant events of our lives. Did not an overturned lamp cause the Chicago fire? Was not Rome saved by the cackling of geese? Why, the destinies of empires have often depended upon the veriest trifles."

But the lady was headstrong and would not be convinced.

To most of us the great consoling fact of life is this oft-repeated assurance of the Scripture that none of us is too humble to be dear to the Father, the object of his special care. The thought dignifies our lives, even the most obscure, and gives us self-respect. The world may "despise and leave us," but if we are conscious of our own innocence and faithfulness, we do not grieve unduly. God seeth not as man seeth—he looketh on the heart—and, resting on him, we can wait his own good time to set us right in the eyes of the world.

A man who was in deep affliction was adjured by a Christian friend to cast himself upon the loving mercy of God.

"He sees you and longs to comfort you," said this friend. "In the execution of the great designs of the world, it is evidently necessary that we should be afflicted. Even the dullest can see that a world entirely without sorrow would be an utterly flavorless and purposeless state. But cast your burden on the Lord and he will sustain you. I know, for I have tried it."

"God cannot be a great God, and yet take notice of our individual griefs," rejoined the afflicted man.

And yet every true Christian knows that God does, by the power of his Spirit, come to the soul of him who trusts, and lightens the bitterest woe until the darkened way is again made plain.

One has put this thought into beautiful verse, which she has called "A Prayer Upon First Awakening":

The night is gone. O Sun of Righteousness,
Arise, and fill with light this soul of mine.
Dispel all gloom; with thy rich presence bless,
And with thy peace divine.

Thro' all the hours of this new day, dear Lord,
Be ever near, to comfort, guide, defend,
And prove thyself, according to thy word,
An ever-present friend.

What can I do for thee or thine to-day?
May I not be to some poor thirsting one
A cup of blessing? Let me, if I may,
On thy sweet errands run.

What trials lie before me in the way;
What thorns my feet must press are known
To thee.

Enough for me to know—that as my day
My strength shall surely be.

And if these hours on earth should be my last;
If ere the nightfall thou shouldst call me
Home,

All's well—thy loving arms shall hold me fast;
Even so, Lord Jesus, come.

All Six Are Free

These are the famous Lily Butter-Spreaders which you can procure only from Armour & Company.

They are the rage of today. The most popular piece of silverware ever produced by a silversmith.

The price, if you could buy them, would be $3 or more for the six.

The only mark on them is "Wm. Rogers & Son AA"—the mark of the Rogers Extra Plate.

We are going to supply to our customers, for a little time, six of these Spreaders free.

Our offer is this:

Send us the top from a jar of Armour's Extract of Beef. Else send the paper certificate under the top.

Send with it ten cents, to pay the cost of carriage and packing. We will then send you one of these butter-spreaders.

Send us more of the tops as you get them, and send ten cents with each to pay the cost of carriage and packing. We will send one spreader for each top until you get the six.

Thus this beautiful set—the very fad of the day—costs you only our carriage and packing cost—60 cents for the six.

That means that we return to you—for a little time—more than you pay for the Extract of Beef.

One reason is this:

We want you to learn the hundred uses that every home has for a real extract of beef.

Not merely for beef tea—not as a sick-room food. That is the least of its uses.

We want you to know what the Germans know—what the French know about it. This is one of the secrets of their fame as good cooks.

We ask you to use it in soups. Note what a difference it makes.

Add it to gravies—both for flavor and color.

Armour's EXTRACT OF BEEF

Add it to left-overs. Note how appetizing, how delicious it makes them. See how it enables you to utilize things that now go to waste.

Any meat dish that lacks flavor always calls for extract of beef. When you use six jars you will use a hundred. You can't get along without it.

Another reason is this:

We want you to know the difference between Armour's Extract of Beef and others.

Armour's goes four times as far, because it has four times the flavor and four times the strength.

The directions are always, "Use one-fourth as much."

Armour's is concentrated. It is rich and economical. It gives one a new idea of extract of beef. We want you to prove these facts.

There are two ways to tell you the worth of this Extract of Beef. One is to supply you a few jars free. But that would cheapen the extract.

The other is to give you back—for a little time—more than you pay for the extract.

That is what we offer to do.

Then you will have a silver set that will remain in your home for a lifetime.

And then you will know what Armour's Extract of Beef means. And that knowledge, in the years to come, will better a thousand dishes.

Order one jar now—from your druggist or grocer. Send us the top, or certificate, with ten cents. Then judge by the spreader we send you if you want the rest.

Send it today to Armour & Company, Chicago, Dept. AB.

"LORD, MAKE ME REAL"*

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

AND it came to pass after this"—that is, after the five years of exile for Absalom. He had killed his oldest brother for two reasons: First, because his brother had committed a crime, and second, because he feared that brother would succeed to the throne when King David should die. On account of this murder Absalom had fled to his grandfather's home in Syria, remaining there three years. Then, by means of a plot, Absalom gained permission of the king to return in safety to Jerusalem (II. Sam. 14: 1-28).

"Absalom prepared him chariots and horses and fifty men to run before him." It was the outfit of a king, which he had no right to assume, his father being yet alive; and furthermore he was a semi-prisoner, not being permitted to see the face of his father because of his crimes. He had in his heart a still greater crime: to take the kingdom by force.

"Absalom rose up early and stood beside the way of the gate." It was the seat of justice, for it was there the king sat to receive his people that he might hear their grievances, and if possible, adjust them. Absalom rose up early that he might get there before King David.

"Thy servant is one of the tribes of Israel." Thus he fawned upon those who came—he, who would be a king, called himself "a servant," not in humility but in hypocrisy.

"There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee." This was a lie, for David had assigned to Joab and Beniah this duty, but it was easy to make those believe the lie who already felt themselves wronged.

"Oh that I were made judge in the land." Absalom said "judge," but he meant "king." He promised justice, but in a heart so wicked as his there was no place for justice.

"Absalom stole the hearts of the men of Israel." This he did by his flattering manner, which was greatly enhanced by his personal beauty. We are told that "from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head, there was no [physical] blemish in him." And his reddish brown hair was magnificently heavy, and powdered with gold. When he fell upon the necks of those who came, and kissed them, and wept tears of sympathy (?) for their griefs, it is not strange that the people succumbed to his flatteries.

"After forty years." It must have been four years instead of forty. The error no doubt was that of some copyist. The Revised Version says in the margin, "Some ancient authorities read 'four years.'" David died when he was seventy years old, and in the fortieth year of his reign; forty years would have carried the time far beyond his death.

"I pray thee let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed unto the Lord, in Hebron." And so Absalom gained not only his father's consent, but his blessing as well, for the king said unto him, "Go in peace." The father probably thought his wayward son had changed his course and was actually becoming religious, desiring to sacrifice to the Lord! Surely man looks only on the outward appearance.

"Absalom reigneth in Hebron." This message, which he ordered sent throughout all Israel, revealed his real purpose in going to Hebron.

"They went in their simplicity, they knew not anything." So much is said of two hundred men that Absalom called to go with him when he went down to Hebron to offer sacrifice to the Lord.

*The International Sunday School Lesson for November 1, 1908. Absalom Rebels against David, II. Sam. 15: 1-12. GOLDEN TEXT: "Honor thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Ex. 20: 12.

"The conspiracy was strong." Certainly all were not as simple as the two hundred, for there was a great gathering of clans at Hebron. But the backbone of this rebellion was Ahithophel, the chief counselor of David, who had been won over by Absalom so completely that he stopped in the midst of sacrificing to the Lord to answer the call of Absalom, and join him at Hebron.

Absalom as a Dishonoring Son

The Golden Text, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," prompts us to take Absalom's measure as a disobedient son. Ernest Thompson Seton says that the commandments of Moses are "not arbitrary laws given to man, but are fundamental laws of all creation." "The first four," he explains, "are spiritual in nature and do not affect dumb creatures." He made experiments by keeping an assortment of animals in close quarters for some weeks. He placed temptations of every conceivable variety before them and watched the play of their characters. At the end, he testified that "in a few instances one of the commandments was broken, and that retribution always followed swiftly." Some one has said, "Mr. Seton has proven that the commandments apply to animals and humans alike, but he has not discovered why the humans do the most transgressing." It may be said then that a man who breaks the commandments falls below the level of the brutes! Possibly we might as well stop saying "brutish" when we wish to describe a bad person. Absalom was worse than a brute in dishonoring his father, but Absalom is not the only son who has been thus guilty. And some daughters also dishonor their parents, perhaps only in so slight a way as calling them "old fashioned," and by wishing to keep them out of sight, and in the background. Young man, young woman, if you have distanced your parents in acquirements or in social distinction, make them sharers with you in all its joys and benefits, and in most cases they will be able to keep up with you, and you and they will be all the happier. "Honor and reverence age everywhere, for the sake of one's parents; or if reverence and honor are impossible, take, with Japhet and Shem, the mantle of charity."

Absalom as a Hypocrite

He did not mean a word that he said either to the people at the gate, or to his father. "A hypocrite may be both the fairest and the foulest creature in the world; he may be fairest outwardly in the eyes of man, and foulest inwardly in the eyes of God." Such was Absalom. One need not be religious in order to be a hypocrite, although the usual conception of a hypocrite is one who "belongs to the church," and is acting falsely. Absalom was the son of a heathen princess, Maacah. He probably received from her many heathen teachings, and when he had caused the death of his brother he fled to the heathen for safety, to the realm of his heathen grandfather Talmai, king of Geshur. The only time that Absalom the hypocrite ever seems to have worn religion for a cloak was when he asked permission to go to Hebron to sacrifice. As to the ways of hypocrites it is said that they make a great business about small matters, and in the meantime neglect weighty duties, like one who comes into a shop to make a very small purchase, and steals a costly article—buys a penny's worth to steal a dollar's worth. It is said that Julius Caesar was a great dissembler; that when he appeared to be pleased with

The Transformation of Margaret

By MRS. ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," etc.

IN NO other way than that Margaret's mind had given way could Ned account for her words, and for this most extraordinary flight just at the critical moment when she might learn the best—and the worst—of what had come to her lover. To Ned it seemed that the girl must be mad. He could not know that in Margaret's little room at the Mill House some minutes later a girl went down on her knees and sobbed:

"To think that 'twasn't Bobby at all that I was thinking of—'twasn't Bobby at all! 'Twas never Bobby that had my first thought. 'Twas always—' Even to herself Margaret would not say the name, and only her sobs finished the sentence.

Robert McGinnis was not dead when he was tenderly lifted from his box-like prison, but he was still unconscious. In spite of their marvelous escape from death, both he and his employer were suffering from breaks and bruises that would call for the best of care and nursing for weeks to come; and it seemed best for all concerned that this care and nursing should be given at the Mill House. A removal to Belcourt in their present condition would not be wise, the physicians said, and the little town hospital was already overflowing with patients. There really was no place but the Mill House, and to the Mill House they were carried.

At the Mill House everything possible was done for their comfort. Two large, airy rooms were given up to their use, and the entire household was devoted to their service. The children that had been brought there the night of the fire were gone, and there was no one with whom the two injured men must share the care and attention that were lavished upon them. Trained nurses were promptly sent for, and installed in their positions. Beyond these, Margaret and the little lame Arabella were the most frequently seen in the sick rooms.

"We're the ornamental part," Margaret would say brightly. "We do the reading and the singing and the amusing."

Arabella was a born nurse, so both the patients said. There was something peculiarly soothing in the soft touch of her hands and in the low tones of her voice. She was happy in it, too. Her eyes almost lost their wistful look sometimes, so absorbed would she be in her self-appointed task.

As for Margaret—Margaret was a born nurse, too, and both the patients said that; though one of the patients, it is true, complained sometimes that she did not give him half a chance to know it. Margaret certainly did not divide her time evenly. Any one could see that. No one, however—not even Frank Spencer himself—could really question the propriety of her devoting herself more exclusively to young McGinnis, the man she had promised to marry.

CHAPTER XXXIX

MARGARET was particularly bright and cheerful these days; but to a close observer there was something a little forced about it. No one seemed to notice it, however, except McGinnis. He watched her sometimes with sombre eyes; but even he said nothing—until the day before he was to leave the Mill House. Then he spoke.

"Margaret," he began gently, "there is something I want to say to you. I am going to be quite frank with you, and I want you to be so with me. Will you?"

"Why, of—of course," faltered Margaret, nervously, her eyes carefully avoiding his steady gaze. Then, hopefully, "but, Bobby, really I don't think you should talk to-day; not—not about anything that—that needs that tone of voice. Let's read something!"

Bobby shook his head decidedly.

"No. I'm quite strong enough to talk to-day. In fact, I've wanted to say this for some time, but I've waited until to-day so I could say it. Margaret, you—you don't love me any longer."

"Oh—Bobby! Why, Bobby!" There was dismayed distress in Margaret's voice. When one has for some weeks been trying to lash one's self into a certain state of mind and heart for the express sake of some other one, it is distressing to have that other one so abruptly and so positively show that one's labor has been worse than useless.

"You do not, Margaret—you know you do not."

"Why, Bobby, what—what makes you say such a dreadful thing?" cried the girl, reaching blindly out for some support that would not fail. "As if I—I didn't know my own mind!"

Bobby was silent. When he spoke again his voice shook a little.

"I will tell you what makes me say it. For some time I've suspected it—that you did not love me; but after the fire I—knew it."

"You knew it?"

"Yes. When a girl loves a man, and that man has come back almost from the dead, she goes to him first—if she loves him. When Frank Spencer and I were brought into the hall down stairs that Wednesday morning, the jar or something brought back my senses for a moment, just long enough for me to hear your cry of 'Frank!' and to see you hurry to his side."

Margaret caught her breath sharply. Her face grew white.

"But, Bobby, you—you were unconscious, I supposed," she stammered faintly. "I didn't think you could answer me if—I did go to you."

"But you did not—come—to—see." The words were spoken gently, tenderly, sorrowfully.

Margaret gave a low cry and covered her face with her hands. A look that was almost relief came to the man's face.

"There," he sighed. "Now you admit it. We can talk sensibly and"
